Mr. R. C. Arnold

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

10.51 pm

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Portugal is our oldest ally, a partner in NATO, in the EEC and, of course, in the Council of Europe. We have all admired the transition of Portugal to a democracy in recent years. However, one of the characteristics of democracy is that the rights of individuals should be respected. It is because such rights have been transgressed in the case of my constituent that I raise the subject tonight. The failure to settle and the prevarication of the Portuguese Government over some 13 years can only be described as an international scandal.

In January 1970, my constituent, Mr. R. C. Arnold, of Harston, Cambridgeshire, with his partners, acquired 11,000 acres of land at Galveias farm, Alentejo, Portugal, with a lease of 18 years, which was later increased to 24 years. They successfully operated until the Portuguese revolution. Then, in October 1975, they were dispossessed by the Sindicado, which is the Communist trade union. I understand that valuations of the property were made by Portuguese valuers at the time of expropriation.

When democratic government was established in Portugal, the Government recognised the need to adhere to the treaty of 1914 and to compensate for the expropriation, which was agreed in principle. The amount of money involved was approximately £1 million, much of which was for repaying banks.

Subsequently, my noble Friend Lord Pym and then my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice), one of whose constituents was a partner in this venture, have pursued the matter vigorously on behalf of their constituents. However, no progress has been made, despite continued expressions of agreement.

I then came into the picture. On 4 July 1985, Baroness Young, who was then Minister of State, told me that "welcome progress" was being made. That was after 10 years. She told me that the Portuguese had set up an inter-ministerial commission in October 1984. On 10 July, we were told, "Rest assured, we shall continue our efforts" to pursue this matter on behalf of my constituents.

On 8 November, we were told that the claim was about to be settled but a general election intervened in Portugal and caused further delay. However, we were told that it was "agreed in principle". The Foreign Office told me:

"Your constituents' claim will be treated first against those still outstanding".

That was in November 1985, but absolutely nothing happened.

I understand that in May 1986 my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told Senor Cavaco Silva that she viewed the matter with some concern. On 22 July, my constituents told me that the Portuguese lawyers acting for them had been "trying for weeks, without success, to bring the Portuguese authorities to the negotiating table".

On 31 July 1986 Baroness Young told me that the Portuguese Ministry of Agriculture officials would contemplate their valuation report by September 1986, but once again nothing happened. At that stage, my constituents counted up the number of promises of settlement and they came to no fewer than 44, but not a single escudo had been produced.

On 21 October 1986, we were told by the Foreign Office that the "valuation work was all but completed"

and that continued pressure would be brought to bear at the highest level to ensure that, but absolutely nothing happened.

On 4 December 1986, we were told that on 28 November 1986 the British ambassador had handed a message from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the Portuguese Prime Minister expressing concern that the matter had still not been resolved. The Portuguese Prime Minister agreed that it had gone on for "far too long". We were told:

"the way is clear for direct negotiation".

Another six months elapsed and an 80-page document in Portuguese descended on my constituents. Much of their claim was ignored but a derisory offer of less than £300,000 was offered on terms which were by no means clear. On 21 May 1987, my noble Friend Lord Pym was told that the Portuguese Foreign Minister was "anxious to resolve the matter".

There were elections in Portugal on 19 July last year but the Foreign Office said that they "should not delay matters". Once again the time-honoured Foreign Office words were, "We shall continue to press hard". My constituents had received about 69 letters on the subject, but not a solitary escudo.

On 17 August 1987, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State who is to reply to the debate emerged on the scene and informed me that the Foreign Secretary himself had raised the matter twice. The new Portuguese Government had an overall majority for the first time and I was told that the Foreign Office view was that its officials would press hard for the earliest possible decision to be made. However, all that tremendous pressure makes one wonder that the Portuguese have not been ground into the soil. Nevertheless, on 5 November 1987, the Foreign Office said that Senor da Costa Pereira was "urging an early decision" and that they would "not let the matter rest".

We now come to 16 November 1987 when the Portuguese Foreign Minister said that he "appreciated the seriousness of the matter"

and that he would do what he could to clear it up. The last thing that happened was that on 22 March this year my right hon. Friend the Minister of State told me that prior to the Portuguese Prime Minister's visit to this country on 10 to 12 March the Portuguese Government had informed the embassy that they were prepared to compensate British subjects for expropriation "in a just way". My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that she hoped that the matter would be settled quickly, but absolutely nothing has happened.

Thirteen years have now elapsed and, frankly, that is just not good enough. I have always loved Portugal, have admired its people and worked closely with the Portuguese parliamentarians during the 10 years that I was a member of the Council of Europe. However, this is not the behaviour that we expect from our oldest ally and partner. If it had happened in the middle east we should have had hostage taking and violence by now.

Nor does the Foreign Office come out of this affair well. All the talk of pressure has led to nothing. It has been far too feeble in its approach—I exonerate entirely my right hon. Friend the Minister of State from this—and far too wishy-washy. I sincerely hope that my right hon. Friend will have some better news for my unfortunate constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East, who has fought, as I have, on their behalf.

10.59 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): I am grateful for the opportunity which my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) has given me to explain the Government's action on behalf of his constituent, Mr. Arnold, and the managers of the Galveias farm.

First, let me express to Mr. Arnold and his partner the Government's sympathy for the considerable financial loss which they have sustained. I share my hon. Friend's sense of frustration and that of Mr. Arnold that, despite the enormously long lapse of time, no compensation has yet been paid. I hope that I can demonstrate to the House that this is not due to a lack of vigorous and continuous action by this Government or our predecessors. It is due to a lack of response from those who alone can make the positive decision to alter this wrong state of affairs.

The Galveias farm was one of nine British-owned or rented farms in the Alentejo area which were expropriated in 1974-75. The British were not the only ones to have their farms expropriated: Portuguese, Germans, Belgians and other nationalities were also faced with the loss of their livelihood.

It was not for the British Government to negotiate the terms of compensation with the Portuguese. Our role was to do what we could to ensure that compensation was paid. To this end, successive British Governments have made repeated calls on the Portuguese Government on behalf of the owners of the nine expropriated British farms.

We finally appeared to be getting somewhere when, in 1983, five of the original nine farms were returned to their original owners. We believed then that a satisfactory solution for the other four claims was at hand. I am as cross and disappointed as they that our good friends the Portuguese, which they are, have not found it possible to resolve these four remaining claims. The Galveias farm issue and the other three claims are of grave concern which I will raise next week when I see the Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs in Luxembourg at the Foreign Affairs Council. I have arranged for the ambassador to have a copy of the report of this debate tomorrow so that he will be fully aware of the seriousness with which we regard this issue.

During her visit to Portugal in April 1984, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister discussed the question with the then Portuguese Prime Minister, who is now the President, Dr. Mario Soares. They agreed that the issue should be resolved by officials. We continued persistently to lobby in both London and Lisbon.

The Portuguese Government set up an inter-ministerial commission in November 1984 to investigate the claims. Our efforts seemed about to succeed when the inter-ministerial commission accepted the principle of the claim lodged by Mr. Arnold and his partners, and set a deadline for the cases to be resolved by the end of April 1985. Any optimism again proved to be illusory. In the summer of 1985, the Portuguese National Assembly was dissolved, elections were called and again the decision-making process ground to a halt. But our ambassador in Lisbon continued to press for a resolution of the case as soon as the new Government were in place.

In January 1986, the ambassador raised the question with the new Prime Minister, Professor Cavaco Silva. The ambassador provided him with a list of the claims and Professor Cavaco Silva promised to get the new Minister of Finance to look into the matter. The embassy followed up by leaving an aide memoire with the Foreign Ministry in February. On 12 May 1986, when Professor Cavaco Silva called on my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in London, she again pressed for a speedy resolution of the problem. Professor Cavaco Silva told her that a settlement was close and only the amount had to be decided. I visited Lisbon later that month and I too took up the issue. Despite constant pressure from our embassy in Lisbon, no sign of a satisfactory conclusion has appeared.

As my hon. Friend has mentioned, on 28 November 1986, my right hon. Friend sent another message to Professor Cavaco Silva expressing her concern that the problem had still not been overcome. In reply, Professor Cavaco Silva said that the commission report evaluating the four outstanding claims had just been completed. We subsequently learned from the Portuguese embassy that the report had been agreed and that the way was clear for direct negotiations with the claimants.

Pressure on the Portuguese Government continued throughout last year. In particular, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary raised the matter with the Portuguese Foreign Minister when they met on 15 June and again on 22 June.

The Portuguese elections in July last year again delayed progress. The ambassador raised the matter with the Secretary-General of the Portuguese Foreign Ministry in September, as soon as the composition of the new Government was known, and with the Foreign Minister in October. The next part of the litany is that the ambassador reminded the Foreign Minister of the assurances given by the present and previous Governments to settle the claims, and referred in particular to Professor Cavaco Silva's remarks to the Prime Minister in May 1986.

Our ambassador again emphasised that the delay in settling the claims was becoming intolerable and that we did not want the issue to cast a shadow over our otherwise excellent relations. He warned the Portuguese that adverse publicity could be expected if a settlement was not reached soon. The Foreign Minister said that he appreciated the seriousness of the matter and that he would do what he could to clear it up.

Shortly before the visit of the Portuguese Prime Minister to London in March this year, the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs notified our embassy in Lisbon that the Portuguese were prepared to compensate, as my hon. Friend has said, "in a just way." They said that they now had sufficient information to allow them to enter into direct negotiations with the parties concerned or their representatives.

I must tell the House that, when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister saw Professor Cavaco Silva in London on 11 March, she again impressed on him the need to resolve the issue quickly. The embassy in Lisbon subsequently told all the claimants that they should make the necessary contact with the Foreign Ministry and the four British claimants have now provided full details of their claims to the Portuguese Foreign Ministry. Only last week, our ambassador also spoke again to the new Secretary-General of the Foreign Ministry, as he explained to me earlier today.

I make no apology for running through the chronology of events in some detail. That is important if we are to understand the efforts that have been made by the Foreign Office—I must correct my hon. Friend—and by successive British Governments. We have sought to resolve this matter, but it is not in our hands to give the solution into the hands of my hon. Friend's constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice).

This outstanding bone of contention with the Portuguese Government has gone on far too long and it is high time that it was sorted out. Portugal is our oldest ally. We have very good relations, and in 1986 we celebrated the 600th anniversary of the treaty of Windsor. We are friends and partners, and we sit next to one another in European Community meetings. We have a good spirit of friendship that normally solves problems without them ever having to come even to the notice of hon. Members. Certainly they should not take up debating time late in the night.

I believe that the Portuguese Government are aware that such cases are doing harm to their reputation. I hope that they will take it from me tonight that we are determined and convinced that this problem can and should be solved forthwith.

The debate will have provided the Portuguese Government with a demonstration of the depth of feeling aroused by the matter. As I mentioned earlier, our ambassador in Lisbon will be instructed to hand over a copy of the Hansard record of this debate to the Portuguese Foreign Minister. I shall speak to him next week about this matter. I hope that we shall very soon see the grave problems of Mr. Arnold and the other three people solved so that once and for all this issue can be put behind us, which is what should have been done many years ago.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes past Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nelson Mandela

1. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of the Republic of South Africa for the release of Nelson Mandela.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): With the Commonwealth and our European partners, we have long called for the unconditional release of Mr. Mandela and other political prisoners. The issue was most recently raised with the South African Government last month.

Mr. Pike: As the Minister is aware, Nelson Mandela will be 70 on 18 July. I am sure that there will be a massive show of support in Britain for demands for his release on his 70th birthday. Will the Government give an assurance that they will identify themselves in every possible way with the demands that the South African Government release Mr. Mandela at the earliest possible date?

Mrs. Chalker: Our continuing long-standing support for Mr. Mandela's immediate and unconditional release will again be voiced if there is not the most welcome 70th birthday present for Nelson Mandela. We would welcome his release.

Mr. Burns: Will my right hon. Friend comment on any moves within the EEC to bring pressure on the South African Government to resist the introduction of new restrictions on externally funded aid programmes——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is really about Nelson Mandela.

Mr. Winnick: Would not sending birthday greetings to Nelson Mandela show that the Government understand and appreciate that he is the most outstanding South African of his generation? Has he not dedicated his life to fighting racial oppression and tyranny in South Africa? If the Government genuinely believe in human rights, do they not think that those rights should apply in South Africa as well as in the Soviet Union?

Mrs. Chalker: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's second question is yes. As I said to his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), the Government would very much welcome the immediate release of Mr. Mandela and other political prisoners. We hope that that will happen as soon as possible, perhaps without even waiting for 18 July.

I must say to the hon. Gentleman and the House that there are many outstanding black South Africans. We wish that their common sense could be brought to bear on the untenable position of apartheid that still remains.

Mr. Forth: Is not my right hon. Friend just a little unhappy about any suggestion that countries should intervene in the judicial processes of other countries? Is there any end to that? What would be my right hon. Friend's reaction if the South Africans or any other Government approached Her Majesty's Government demanding the release of prisoners in this country?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend has posed that question many times and the answer remains the same. We do not attempt to intervene in any case unless we believe that there are political grounds—indeed, very particular political grounds. We have said that on many occasions. The Government's policy on Nelson Mandela has been consistent and we do not intend to change it.

Mr. Kaufman: In response to the Minister's hon. Friend —if she can call him that—the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), does she agree that if a 70-year-old man had been in prison in Britain for more than 25 years on trumped-up political charges, it would be perfectly right for other democratic countries to protest?

Does the right hon. Lady agree that it is appropriate that the House sends its congratulations and good wishes to Mr. Mandela on his birthday in support of her demand that he be released? Does she further agree that while the release of Nelson Mandela is essential, the ending of the filthy system that has put him in prison is even more necessary?

Mrs. Chalker: The right hon. Gentleman knows me better than to put those slightly barbed questions. I believe that it is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, whether the House should send greetings to any individual. However, on the occasion of Mr. Mandela's 70th birthday, I sincerely hope that the request of all EC countries and of Governments throughout the world for his release will be granted. I may add that that is the Government's policy and not just mine as an individual, and the right hon. Gentleman should take care to make that distinction.

Mr. Dykes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's policy is robust and clear and that it is supported on both sides of the House? Will my right hon. Friend do what she implied in her earlier answer and give publicity to others who are not as well known as Nelson Mandela but who are incarcerated with him or still on Robben island, and consider a further collective EC initiative to publicise that tragic and criminal act of continuing incarceration?

Mrs. Chalker: With my right hon. and learned Friend, I shall consider with great care the comments of my hon. Friend. We have always called for the release of all political prisoners and have not restricted that call only to Mr. Nelson Mandela.

Mr. Steel: Following the previous question, does the Minister agree that Nelson Mandela's 70th birthday provides an opportunity for Her Majesty's Government, as the biggest single contributor to the European Community's programme of support for the victims of apartheid, to protest vigorously against the legislation that is passing through the South African Parliament and which may bring an end to that programme?

Mrs. Chalker: We do not have to wait until 18 July for that to occur; we are making that protest continually and repeatedly. We shall go on doing so for as long as may be necessary.

Israeli-Arab Dispute

2. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, whether he intends to take any new initiatives to try to resolve the Israeli-Arab dispute; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): We continue to work for the convening of an international conference as a framework for negotiations to resolve the conflict, and we urge all parties to respond positively to Secretary Shultz's continuing initiative.

Mr. Hicks: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that the Palestinian uprising in the occupied territories is now entering its seventh month? Does he agree that during that period the Palestinians have shown commendable restraint? Does that not suggest that the time has come, if we are to make the progress that my right hon. and learned Friend seeks, to speak to and recognise the PLO, which represents the Palestinians in the occupied territories?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree with my hon. Friend that the long duration of the patient protest of the Palestinian people in the occupied territories underlines the urgency of the case for action towards the settlement of this long-running dispute. We are in regular dialogue at official level with the organisation to which my hon. Friend refers. The PLO is well aware of those aspects of its policy which make renewed ministerial contact difficult. They are the need to acknowledge without qualification Security Council resolution 242, to recognise Israel's right to exist, and to eschew the use of violence.

Mr. Galloway: Hearing the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, and having returned only a day or two ago from the occupied territories, I wonder whether the Government are as aware as they ought to be of just how serious is the reign of terror in which the occupying forces are engaged. Bodies are being carried through the streets to hospitals and clinics. People are being shot, beaten and gassed—including indiscriminate gassing by crop-spraying aeroplanes flying over refugee camps.

I wonder whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware of the case of an elderly gentleman, Mr. Mohammed Abu Shawish, who is an official of the United Nations and is the refugees services officer in Jabalia camp, and who took the Minister of State around that camp and served as his interpreter? That gentleman's elderly wife of 63—[Interruption.] Please, this is an important point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman, in the interests of others, to be brief.

Mr. Galloway: The 63-year-old wife of the gentleman who helped the Minister of State was savagely beaten by Israeli soldiers three days after the Minister left the camp. Four of her ribs and her arm were broken by the Israeli occupying troops.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is quite right to remind the House of the unacceptable conduct being sustained in the occupied territories. I have discussed it in the course of the past few days, not only with Secretary of State Shultz but with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Mr. Shevardnadze. It is clear that, as Mr. Shultz said on his arrival in Israel:

"The continued occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza strip and the denial of political rights to the Palestinians is a dead end street . . . The belief that this can continue is an illusion."

I share the concern expressed by the hon. Gentleman at the possibility of the use of gas in any circumstances in those conditions. As for his particular complaint about my hon. and learned Friend's guide on his visit to Palestine, I shall certainly instruct Her Majesty's consul-general in Jerusalem to contact the family and report immediately. If any kind of link can be demonstrated between the treatment received by the guide and his family and my hon. and learned Friend's visit, we shall clearly have to take an even more serious view of what may have happened.

Mr. Adley: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the activities of the Syrians in Lebanon, particularly in Beirut, are a welcome step in the right direction towards reducing anarchy in that city? Does he not agree that it would be advantageous, if we are to make progress with the peace conference to which he has referred, for diplomatic contact with the Syrians at all levels to be maintained by countries interested in playing a part in the peace process?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The time has not come, nor have the conditions been fulfilled, for us to reconsider any change in our relationships with the Syrian Government. Clearly, however, any action being taken by that Government that can help towards the promotion of peace, unity and independence for Lebanon is certainly to be welcomed.

Mr. Cartwright: Will the Foreign Secretary again confirm that the Palestinians are just as entitled to a homeland of their own as is any other nation on the face of the earth, and that there can be no lasting peace in the middle east until that simple fact is accepted by all concerned?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Two propositions stand with equal importance alongside each other: the right of Israel and other states in the area to a secure existence, and the Palestinian right to self-determination. Those are the two bedrock principles on which, sooner rather than later, the parties must begin to negotiate for peace, on the basis of territory.

Ethiopia

3. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from Her Majesty's Ambassador in Ethiopia on the situation in Eritrea and Tigray and its implications for the United Kingdom's relations with Ethiopia.

Mrs. Chalker: Although neither Her Majesty's ambassador in Ethiopia nor his staff are permitted to visit these areas, he reports regularly and fully on the situation in Eritrea and Tigray. Their reports are taken fully into account in framing policy towards Ethiopia.

Mr. Davis: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House the number of people at risk from famine in Eritrea and Tigray? Does not the appalling situation in those provinces, and the restrictions applied to aid workers by the Mengistu Government, tell us that there should be a much more liberal and less extreme regime in respect of the northern provinces?

Mrs. Chalker: The best estimate that we can make of the number of people at risk from famine is some 7 million;3 million in Eritrea and Tigray. We believe that enough food is available at present; certainly it has been pledged. The difficulty will always be delivering food to war-affected areas, and that is made the more difficult if aid workers in the country cannot help in the process. We have urged the Ethiopian Government to reconsider their decision. Some United Nations personnel have been allowed to return to the north, but there are many other aid agency people in Ethiopia who want to help to prevent famine.

Sir Jim Spicer: Does my right hon. Friend not accept that that begs the main question? The people of Eritrea were handed over into bondage under the Ethiopians. They were not consulted about it. They were handed over with the then Government of this country playing a major role. Has not the time come for us to accept that they do not wish to be part of a country that is ruled by a corrupt, evil, authoritarian Communist regime, and should be given the right to decide whether they wish to be independent?

Mrs. Chalker: The territorial integrity of a country such as Ethiopia is a matter that we look at carefully, as my hon. Friend knows. The situation in Ethiopia is serious and worrying, and we will do our best to help in humanitarian terms. However, I am afraid that it is not for us to comment on the allusion of my hon. Friend.

Chile (Plebiscite)

4. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made any representations to the Government of Chile concerning the conditions under which the impending plebiscite will be held.

Mr. Eggar: Yes Sir. We make frequent representations.

Mr. Worthington: I am relieved to hear that news, because there is widespread anxiety among Opposition Members about the deteriorating situation in Chile, which is shared by Solidarity, the Vicararade and Amnesty International. The persecution of trade union leaders and opposition Members in Chile is running at the rate of 95 a month. Will the Minister double his efforts to protest about the deteriorating human rights situation in Chile?

Mr. Eggar: I recognise the concern in the House about the situation in Chile. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, together with our European partners, we make a number of private and public representations about human rights there. We hope that the plebiscite will be conducted in an appropriate manner, and the co-operation among the opposition parties, in particular, is encouraging.

Mr. Temple-Morris: Is my hon. Friend aware that the plebiscite is a reality in which General Pinochet has chosen to offer himself as the only candidate? Therefore, will my hon. Friend accept that the most practical action that the House can take—in conjunction, one hopes, with Washington and our European allies—is to ensure that during the run-up to the campaign—and not just for the statutory 30 days of the campaign—there is fair access to the media for parties that have only the option of campaigning for a no vote and generally fair treatment during the campaign? Will he exercise pressure on behalf of the Government to that end?

Mr. Eggar: Of course, no announcement has yet been made about whether General Pinochet will be the candidate, although there are a number of rumours to that effect.

It is important to note that all the major opposition parties have combined and have announced that they will be campaigning for a no vote in the plebiscite. The signs so far are that the plebiscite will be fairly conducted.

Mr. Wareing: I found the answer of the Minister astounding. Surely, there cannot be a freely elected President of Chile as long as the leaders of political parties —such as the leader of the Socialist party—are in prison. Would it not be appropriate for the Minister or, better still, his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who has recently visited dissidents in the Soviet Union, to ask the Chilean dictator if they could visit Chile to speak to the dissidents, in the hope that there might be some glasnost in Chile next year?

Mr. Eggar: I have already said to the House—I think that it is widely recognised—that we take an active part in promoting the cause of human rights within Chile. We will continue to do so. However, the fact remains that over 5·5 million Chileans have registered for the plebiscite to entitle them to vote. They are registering at the rate of about 400,000 a month. That is to be welcomed. It has been welcomed by the opposition parties. One has to take account of the fact that the opposition parties in Chile are taking part in that plebiscite and are combining for a no vote.

Mr. Foulkes: The hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) has cogently pointed out the shortcomings of the plebiscite. Does the Minister agree that if the plebiscite is to have even a semblance of fairness, it is essential that the right of free association is given to the opposition, along with free access to the media at all times, the immediate lifting of the state of emergency and the immediate release of Clodomiro Almeyda, the Socialist leader? Will the British Government join the American Government and our European partners to make it abundantly clear to General Pinochet and the junta that those are the minimum guarantees to ensure any kind of fairness?

Mr. Eggar: I advise the hon. Gentleman that there is a later question on that matter on the Order Paper. The Chilean Government are well aware of our concern about Senor Almeyda. The democratic opposition now have some access to the television—I know that the hon. Gentleman recognises that as a step in the right direction —but we should like to see more access and we have made that absolutely clear. We welcome Admiral Merino's recent commitment to lift the state of emergency 30 days before the plebiscite but we should much prefer that to be done now.

Secretary General, United Nations

5. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Secretary General of the United Nations; and what subjects he expects to be discussed.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no immediate plans to do so. I last met the secretary general of the United Nations on 23 May. We had a useful and wide-ranging discussion.

Mr. Evans: Will the Foreign Secretary assure the House that the next time that he has the opportunity to have a discussion with the secretary general he will raise the question of chemical weapons? Has any progress been made at Geneva in the talks on the reduction of chemical weapons? I agree with the statement at the special session of the United Nations on disarmament that the use of chemical weapons is a particularly repulsive form of barbarism. Has any progress been made in on-site inspection and verification, especially in commercial chemical plants?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the importance of that point. When I spoke at the United Nations general assembly yesterday in the presence of the secretary general, I devoted a large part of my speech to the need to make headway in outlawing chemical weapons. I stressed the work that has been going on—in which Britain has been taking a leading part—in the Geneva talks and that is technical, difficult and must be pressed ahead urgently. That is why the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union have opened their chemical weapons defence establishments to inspection by each other as a contribution to openness. I also stressed the need for more urgent action to outlaw the spreading use of chemical weapons in conflicts such as the Gulf war.

Mr. Lester: When my right hon. and learned Friend has discussed events with the secretary general, has he raised the deteriorating situation in the Sudan, which causes many of us great concern because there is clear evidence of genocide and complete irrationality in the behaviour of the Sudanese Government? When I last spoke to Sadiq al-Mahdi, he particularly wanted the secretary general to go to Sudan and to consider the situation in the Horn of Africa. Has that featured in my right hon. and learned Friend's discussions?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that. It is not a subject that I discussed with the secretary general when I saw him on 23 May, but I knew that it was on his mind because he was then on his way to the OAU meeting in Addis Ababa. I shall certainly keep it in mind for my next contact with him.

Ms. Short: When the Secretary of State meets the secretary general, will he explain why he would be unwilling to meet the PLO until it renounces the use of force and recognises the right of Israel to exist, when he happily meets representatives of the Israeli Government who are engaged in massive and brutally illegal use of force in the occupied territories and give absolutely no undertaking that they recognise the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination in their own state, whereas the PLO said that it would embrace all United Nations' resolutions, which includes a willingness to recognise the right of Israel to exist? Why do the British Government have double standards?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We do not have double standards in that respect—[Interruption.] Nor in any other respect; I always address myself to the question.

When I met the Foreign Minister of Israel in Brussels about three weeks ago it was clear that he well understood the need to respect the rights and aspirations of the Palestinian people, and it is on that basis that one has contact with the properly established Government of a country with whom we have diplomatic relations.

With regard to the PLO we have striven very hard—the hon. Lady may remember our efforts of two years ago—to establish a meeting of a joint delegation of Palestinian and Jordanian people on well-known terms—the repudiation of violence, recognition of resolution 242 without qualification and recognition of Israel's right to exist. In our judgment—we are not alone in this—it is important to go on emphasising those conditions.

Dr. Blackburn: When my right hon. and learned Friend next meets the secretary general of the United Nations will he confirm that it is the view of Her Majesty's Government that United Nations resolution 242 is not negotiable and that the Government stand four square upon it? Will he also consider the prospect of helping in the process of restoring diplomatic relations between the state of Israel and Russia?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our commitment to the importance of resolution 242 goes without saying and it is of the utmost importance. The restoration of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and Israel is clearly worthy of consideration. I know from my recent meetings with the Foreign Ministers of both countries that that is in the minds of both parties.

Mr. Anderson: The Foreign Secretary will be aware that there was some confusion in our press yesterday as to whether the Prime Minister had received a communication from the secretary general about Cyprus and particularly on the latest initiative of the secretary general in respect of that island. Was that letter received in our capacity as a guarantor power? What response will the Government make? Will we try to persuade the President of Cyprus and the leader of the Turkish Cypriot community to meet as foreshadowed in that letter?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Cyprus question is another important matter that the Prime Minister and I both discussed with the secretary general during his visit here on 23 May. We give strong and continuing support to his efforts to reach a settlement.

Yesterday in New York I was able to have a short meeting with President Vassiliou and I was glad to welcome his readiness for negotiations under the auspices of the United Nations. Yesterday he reaffirmed that readiness to the secretary general. In the same way we are encouraged by Mr. Denktash's acceptance, in principle, of the secretary general's initiative to attend an early meeting with President Vassiliou. We are in close and continuous contact with the parties. The only thing that is not yet well established is the existence of a letter of the type to which the hon. Gentleman referred. No such letter has been received, but in its absence we are doing everything we should.

Mr. Boswell: On a more domestic vein, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider raising with the secretary general the question of outstanding arrears of subscriptions to the United Nations by various member states?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Yes, I discussed that matter with the secretary general when we met. It is an important matter because, at the beginning of the year, no fewer than half the member states of the United Nations were in arrears with their assessed contributions. We shall continue to press the matter.

Entry Clearance Applications (Indian Sub-continent)

6. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further proposals he has for reducing delays in entry clearance applications to the United Kingdom from the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Eggar: More than 90 per cent. of visit-visa applications in the Indian sub-continent are processed within 24 hours. Any delay in remaining visit cases is usually due to the need to produce further documentary evidence.

Mr. Madden: Is the Minister aware that there has been a sharp increase in the number of settlement applications referred to the United Kingdom for inquiry? Is he aware that that means that many fiancés and spouses are having to wait an extra six or 12 months for a decision to be taken on their application, having already waited anything up to 12 months for an initial interview? Will he encourage overseas posts, especially Islamabad, to reduce the number of applications referred to Britain for local inquiries to be made, or press the Home Office to appoint more immigration officers so that the necessary interviews and inquiries can be conducted far more expeditiously than they are now?

Mr. Eggar: At the end of 1979 there were almost 43,000 people awaiting interview in the Indian sub-continent. There are now just over 12,000. The hon. Gentleman will welcome that considerable progress. Only four years ago we had 43 ECOs in the Indian sub-continent and we now have 86. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman might occasionally welcome the improvements that have been made.

Mr. Marlow: Is it not time that we considered introducing a language test for those seeking entry clearance to this country? Where both parties to a marriage have a common language and that language is not English, is it not more sensible, sensitive and humane for them to be settled in the country where that language is spoken?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that my hon. Friend would receive a full reply to that point from the Home Office.

Mr. Janner: Does the Minister accept that the delays in obtaining entry clearance documents are not the end of the matter because the delays at Heathrow for people who arrive there remain unworthy, intolerable and among the worst of any airport in the world? Does he propose to attend to that end of the problem and thereby to make life decent and easier for those who visit this country, never mind those who wish to stay?

Mr. Eggar: While all delays at airports are regrettable there has been a dramatic improvement since we introduced the visa regimes in the Indian sub-continent.

China (Economic and Trade Relations)

7. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what rôle his Department is playing in promoting economic and trade relations with the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Eggar: We work closely with the Department of Trade and Industry to help British exporters. British companies have won substantial contracts financed at concessional rates under our bilateral aid programme. The claims agreement signed with China in 1987 has opened access for China to the London capital market.

Mr. Shaw: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that British business men are doing enough in this respect and taking advantage of all the opportunities that his Department is opening up? Does he think that if more was done by British business men the economies and jobs of both countries would benefit?

Mr. Eggar: We welcome the considerable commitment that has been made by British business. More than 2,500 British business men visited our posts in China in 1986. There are more than 20 companies with permanent representative offices and we have no fewer than 11 United Kingdom-based commercial staff in Shanghai and Beijing.

Mr. Mullin: Does the Minister have any plans for raising with the Chinese Government the issue of human rights in that country; or am I being naive?

Mr. Eggar: I would not want to comment on the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, but human rights and other issues are discussed when my right hon. and learned Friend meets representatives of the Chinese Government.

Mr. Roger King: Does my hon. Friend agree that we are seeing in China a degree of reform in its economic policies by the concentration of economic growth on a growing number of small business men? Is not that factor very much to the fore in this country and can we not export some of our economic reforms under Thatcherism to China?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There has been a considerable resurgence in economic activity in China and it is largely due to the liberalisation reforms that have been introduced by that Government. The economic policies propounded by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have been followed not only in China, but throughout the world.

Hong Kong (Basic Law)

8. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and how he intends to make representations to the Government of China in relation to the Basic Law of Hong Kong.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The drafting of the Basic Law is the responsibility of the Chinese Government. If there are points which we consider are inconsistent with the joint declaration, we shall make our views known to the Chinese authorities clearly and firmly.

Mr. Marshall: Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the rising tide of migration from Hong Kong, particularly among professional people who fear for their future there after it is taken over by China? As a consequence of that, does he propose to suggest any alteration to the draft Basic Law to seek to allay the fears that are giving rise to migration?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am aware that there has been some increase in the amount of emigration from Hong Kong, not least because of increased opportunities in some of the recipient countries. There are also large numbers of people returning to Hong Kong. That should be regarded as an important factor in maintaining confidence in the territory. It was on that basis that I discussed it yesterday with the Chinese Foreign Minister, when I met him in New York. In the same conversation I made it clear, as he well knows, that it is important for the Basic Law, which is now the subject of consultation for a five-month period, to fulfil precisely the commitments which were so important in the joint declaration signed by both countries. We shall continue to stress its importance in the many opportunities open to us.

Sir Peter Blaker: While there are probably some parts of the draft Basic Law which need to be changed, which would not be surprising in any first draft, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the wide consultations that the Chinese authorities have arranged regarding the draft Basic Law, both before its publication and since, shows their desire for the final Basic Law to correspond with the joint declaration and to be acceptable to the people of Hong Kong as a whole?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I agree strongly with that point. The Basic Law first draft as published is itself a substantial document with important alternatives on some key points. It is expressly the subject of wide consultation in Hong Kong. When I was there last week, I welcomed the willingness of the Chinese authorities to consult as fully as they are doing. I am sure that will make an important contribution to confidence in Hong Kong.

Dr. Bray: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the draft of the Basic Law departs from the joint declaration in certain important respects, such as the autonomy of the special administrative region and the power of the courts in Hong Kong to determine the legitimacy of legislation, rather than for this to be determined solely by Beijing? Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the strength of his position has been undermined by his statement in Hong Kong that full democracy is not for Hong Kong?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It would have been if I had said that. What I said was that at the time of the original commitment in the course of our negotiations on the joint declaration, when we secured a commitment to an elected legislative authority, that did not necessarily imply any particular form of election in any particular volume. That has been the subject of many discussions in the subsequent Green and White Papers, the latest conclusions of which were welcomed by an overwhelming majority of the Legislative Council the other day. The Basic Law itself makes important provisions for the independence of the judiciary, for the continuation of the common law system and for final judgment to be vested in Hong Kong, but I am aware that difficult areas are bound to exist in the distribution of powers of this kind, which are the subject of further consideration in Hong Kong.

Turkey (Human Rights)

9. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received on human rights violations in Turkey.

Mrs. Chalker: We have received a number of representations. The Turkish Government are well aware of our views about this matter.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that despite numerous requests to the Turkish Government, direct and through the United Nations, there are still 1,619 Greek Cypriot citizens unaccounted for, many of whom were taken to Turkey following the Turkish invasion in 1974? Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that any significant progress on the Turkish application for full EC membership will be made conditional upon the rectification of such human rights abuses?

Mrs. Chalker: May I comment on the second part of my hon. Friend's question. In accordance with standard procedures, the Turkish application for membership of the Community was referred in April last year to the European Commission for the preparation of an opinion. Any Government would reserve comment on an application until they had studied the Commission's opinion. That is by no means likely to come forward soon. Of course we recognise that any application to join the Community has in it the understanding that the rules of the Community will be abided by; that includes human rights.

As to my hon. Friend's question about the specific number of missing Greek Cypriots who may be in Turkey, the Turkish and Greek Prime Ministers called in Brussels in March this year for the reactivation of the United Nations missing persons committee. We believe from the Greeks that some missing Greek Cypriots may be in Turkey, but the Turks deny it. I shall go further into this issue because it was discussed between the Greeks and the Turks when they met in a committee following the meeting between the two Prime Ministers in Davos.

Mr. Morley: Apart from considering the important issue of human rights in Turkey, will the Minister ensure that the veto is used to keep Turkey out of the Common Market until there is some genuine progress in resolving the situation in Cyprus and a move towards the reunification of the island?

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman raises a matter that is with the Commission and which is not likely to come back to the Council of Ministers for some considerable time. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said in answer to a previous question, resolving the problems of Cyprus is very much a matter of the two communities beginning to talk together. I have every confidence that such talks will take place and that gradually through the umbrella of the United Nations, we shall seek to give whatever help we can to resolve the problem of Cyprus.

Mr. Madel: Will my right hon. Friend confirm the Government's view that Turkey should not become a member of the European Community as long as it keeps part of its army in Cyprus?

Mrs. Chalker: I do not think that we have to address that specific question at this time. As far as one can see the matter is far off. I remind my hon. Friend that any application to become a member of the Community has to have the assent of the European Parliament. It is well known how strongly the European Parliament exercises its views on human rights issues. The Parliament will be looking at the matter as will member Governments of the Community. As I have said, the whole matter is a long way off.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Minister of State aware that in Turkey the use of the Kurdish language is officially banned and that people are imprisoned for using it? Is she also aware that many people have been in prison for the past few years because of their political opinions, that some trials have continued for three or four years and that today in Ankara the trial opened of the general secretaries of the Workers' party and the Communist party of Turkey? Does she not think that it is time for the Government to condemn all abuses of human rights in Turkey and to stop propping up the Turkish Government diplomatically and supplying them with arms?

Mrs. Chalker: As usual I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has made one or two assertions which are his views and a long way from the actual situation. The trial of Mr. Kutlu and Mr. Sagin opened today in Turkey. We are well aware of the allegations of torture and expect Turkey to abide by the European and United Nations conventions against torture. We are confident that Mr. Kutlu and Mr. Sagin will receive a fair hearing under Turkish law. It is vital that human rights are respected throughout the world, and that excludes nobody, but nobody.

United States Secretary of State

11. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will next meet the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Shultz; and what subjects he expects to discuss.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I met Mr. Shultz in London last Friday and shall meet him again in Madrid this evening. We regularly discuss a wide range of bilateral and international topics.

Mr. Allen: When the Foreign Secretary meets Mr. Shultz in Madrid this evening, will he ask him what plans he has to reciprocate the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan? What gestures will be made by the American side? If Mr. Shultz has no concrete suggestions, will the Secretary of State suggest that Mr. Shultz should see his colleagues and friends in Honduras and ask them to disperse the Contra bases that still exist in that country?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I doubt whether I shall be discussing the latter point with Mr. Shultz in Madrid this evening, or in the near future. On the first point raised by the hon. Gentleman, he has a total misunderstanding of the situation. The idea that anyone should take any reciprocal action for the action of the Soviet Union in withdrawing its troops from Afghanistan is wholly without foundation. The world welcomes the decision by the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops and to complete withdrawal this year. We now look forward to an opportunity for the Afghan people to reach a comprehensive peace settlement on the basis of a Government acceptable to them all.

Mr. David Howell: In preparation for his meeting with Mr. Shultz, will my right hon. and learned Friend make it quite clear that, contrary to some newspaper reports, he holds no preference between one American presidential candidate and another in the forthcoming presidential election, that that is a matter for the American people to decide, and that either would do quite nicely?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. As I said on the David Frost programme on Sunday—that important organ of public opinion—it is part of the democratic process that one works with the leader who emerges at the end of the day. I and Her Majesty's Government look forward to continuing close and friendly co-operation with whatever Administration emerges.

Mr. Ernie Ross: When the Foreign Secretary meets Mr. Shultz tonight will he discuss with him the failure of his most recent peace initiative in the middle east? Will he try to explain to Mr. Shultz that it is no good making rather bellicose statements in Israel, Egypt or anywhere else in the middle east unless the Americans are prepared to meet the Palestinians, and that means meeting representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organisation? Would it not help if, when he meets Secretary Shultz tonight, he confirms that he intends to meet the Palestinian representatives?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman may not have observed that on his arrival in Israel on this occasion, Mr. Shultz offered to meet Palestinian representatives, but unfortunately they were unwilling to meet him. The important thing to acknowledge about the latest sustained initiative by Secretary Shultz is the tenacity with which he is pursuing it. It is enormously to be welcomed that he is continuing his visits to the region, pressing both sides with the central, inescapable features that the prospects of peace must be founded on the recognition of Israel's right to a secure existence and on the recognition of the Palestinian right to self-determination, and that those parties must get together on that basis. I very much welcome the extent to which Mr. Shultz has been hammering home those essential features and emphasising to all those concerned that the present state of affairs cannot possible continue and they have to get together and look for a better future.

Mr. Bill Walker: When my right hon. and learned Friend meets Mr. Shultz and discusses with him the problems of the West Bank, will he remind him of the post-Palestinian era and that the Arab legion was the first occupying army on the West Bank? It occupied it in 1948 and was not removed until some time later. That has bedevilled the situation and the attempts that have been made to find peace in that area.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I think that is one of the features which I shall not be drawing to Mr. Shultz's attention, because I do not think that either side is likely to find material for building a better future by digging that deep into the past.

Mr. Robertson: Over brandy this evening in Madrid, will the Secretary of State take the opportunity to explain to Mr. Shultz why only seven days after Mikhail Gorbachev and Ronald Reagan choked off the rhetoric of the cold war, the Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office chose yesterday to kick-start the engine of confrontation by bleating out the redundant vocabulary about the increasing Soviet threat? Is it not bizarre that the Right-wing President of the United States of America should now be preaching international reconciliation while Ministers in this Government are preaching confrontation and conflict?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have seldom heard the hon. Gentleman achieve such profound misunderstanding. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) says that if I were here more often I would hear it more often.

I shall try to resolve the misunderstanding between the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson). Of course we welcome the tremendous progress that has been made during the past five years in establishing a better, sustainable foundation for East-West relations, and it is important to acknowledge the part played by Mr. Reagan and by Mr. Gorbachev, but it would be foolish to allow ourselves to forget the continuing reality. As I said to the United Nations yesterday, the Soviet Union continues to maintain an offensive weapons posture and to launch a new submarine every 36 days, and it will achieve complete renewal of inter-continental resources from the mid-1980s to the 1990s. We have to maintain a reality in our minds while we go on working, as we shall go on working, for steady improvements in the long-term pattern of East-West relations.

Mr. Sackville: Will my right hon. and learned Friend impress on Mr. Shultz the fact that, however great are the improvements in United States-Soviet relations, the Soviet Union retains two important characteristics—it is the most heavily armed nation ever in peace-time and it is a dictatorship? That is a very dangerous combination.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall continue to remind Mr. Shultz, although he does not need reminding of it, that there has been no reduction in the Soviet threat to Western Europe. It still retains a massive conventional superiority and an overwhelmingly large chemical weapons capability. Moreover, it still retains almost all of the features of a totalitarian state. Only modest qualifications have been made. Modifications are being made. We shall continue to press for them and to welcome them, but we shall continue to maintain the vigilance that is proper in this matter.

Senor Clodomiro Almeyda

12. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he intends to make to the Government of Chile in relation to the continued imprisonment of the Socialist Party leader Clodomiro Almeyda.

Mr. Eggar: The Chilean Government have been told on several occasions of our concern, and that of our European Community partners, about Senor Almeyda since his arrest in 1987. We remain in touch with our European Community partners on this issue.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Minister agree that while significant leaders of the Left such as Mr. Almeyda remain in prison on trumped-up charges, there can be no meaningful return to democracy in Chile? Does he further agree that it is an utter deception for him to suggest otherwise, as he did earlier?

Mr. Eggar: I made it clear that we have made representations about the treatment of Senor Almeyda. I said, and I am happy to repeat it, that there have been considerable moves in the right direction in Chile. They have not gone nearly far enough, but we should at least recognise movement when there has been some.

Mr. Gow: To what extent, if at all, is it a principle of British foreign policy that we do not interfere in the internal affairs of other sovereign states?

Mr. Eggar: I did not recognise my hon. Friend criticising the President of the United States for making representations about human rights in the Soviet Union. It is clearly recognised, by the various United Nations and other conventions to which we are party, that we have a right to indicate our views on human rights in other countries.

Mr. Heffer: Is the Minister aware that I agree with what he said to the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow)? It is important that the British Government are as strong about human rights in Chile as they are about human rights in the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, will the Minister be a bit more vigorous about what is happening in Chile, just as the Government have rightly been vigorous about human rights in the Soviet Union?

Mr. Eggar: When the hon. Gentleman leaps to my defence I get slightly worried, but I must tell him and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) that, in regard to human rights, we try to be utterly consistent as between different countries and different regimes. Even if that is not recognised by the hon. Gentleman, it is by the international community and the human rights commission of the United Nations. We have a fine record of being consistent.

USSR (Refuseniks)

13. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the frequency with which he makes representations to the Russian Government about their treatment of refuseniks.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Mellor): We raise human rights questions, including the problem of Jewish emigration, with the Soviet authorities at every suitable opportunity. My right hon. and learned Friend did so in detail during his talks with Mr. Shevardnadze in Moscow in February. He also raised some humanitarian cases in his meeting with Mr. Shevardnadze in New York two days ago. We shall be making further detailed representations during bilateral human rights talks in June.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the number of exit visas granted by the Russians is much smaller and the basic Russian laws much harsher than they were in 1979, long before glasnost? Will he continue to tell the Soviet Union that as long as it cheats on the obligations that it accepted in Helsinki, its signature on all other international documents will be suspect? When he next raises individual cases, will he raise the case of Mr. Oscar Eleyev, who has waited 20 years to receive an exit visa from Russia, and Mr. Vladimir Mishkov, who has waited for eight years? Those delays are quite intolerable.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend knows that we raise such cases. I shall look sympathetically at this suggestion that we raise those two cases and write to him about them. We are looking for an outcome to the Vienna CSCE talks, which will mark a movement forward from Helsinki. We have made it clear to the Soviet Union that we attach importance to it honouring the obligations into which it entered in Helsinki as a sign of its good faith in other agreements. Of course it is important that there should be freedom of movement, but it is also important that some of the pressure in Soviet society from people wanting to leave should be reduced by allowing people religious freedom, so that Jewish people can practise their religion freely in the Soviet Union. That would be a step forward in accordance with the obligations entered into in Helsinki.

National Engineering Laboratory, East Kilbride

3.32 pm

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed privatisation of the National Engineering Laboratory at East Kilbride."

The Government announced yesterday in a written answer to me that they propose to sell off to the private sector one of the foremost research establishments in the world. The National Engineering Laboratory celebrates its 40th anniversary in one week's time. During the 40 years of its existence, it has established a reputation not only in this country but throughout the world as a centre of scientific excellence in engineering research.

It is the only major research establishment in this country that is not based in the prosperous south-east. It is the only major research establishment in any of the regional development areas.

Given its importance to the Scottish economy, the manner in which the Government made the announcement, without due regard to the need for accountability in such matters to the House, was decidedly unacceptable and showed contempt for the people who will be affected by it.

The Government have given potential purchasers only until 22 July to submit bids for the establishment. That indecent haste will effectively mean that the sell off will take place when the House is in recess and, therefore, will not be subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

The announcement is completely at variance with the assurances given by the Secretary of State only a matter of weeks ago, when he denied that such a proposition was likely to see the light of day.

The proposal places at risk 600 high-quality jobs and involves the sell off of a major British resource, without regard to the national interest and without any guarantee for its long-term future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the proposed privatisation of the National Engineering Laboratory at East Kilbride."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House. I hope that he will find other ways of raising the matter.

Points of Order

3.35 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As reported in column 729 of yesterday's Hansard, you said in response to my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) and Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that the possible misleading of the House by the Secretary of State for Education and Science might be a matter of privilege. You asked us to write to you, and that we have done. I understand perfectly well——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has written to me on this as a matter of privilege and I am looking into it. I cannot allow him to raise it now.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. From time to time you are placed in some difficulty as a result of the Government evading their responsibility and not making statements to the House. [Interruption.] There is no need to get excited; we are not setting light to anything.

According to reports today and a written answer, the Government are proposing to announce a serious change regarding planning requirements for local authorities in respect of opencast applications. Bearing in mind the commercial viability that the Government are now asking local authorities to take into account when considering opencast applications, in my opinion and the opinion of many, the change would alter the nature of planning consent by local authorities in respect not only of opencast applications but perhaps of incursions into the green belt in your constituency, Mr. Speaker, and goodness knows how many others.

On occasions, Mr. Speaker, you have chided the Government for using the method of answering written questions late in the day when hon. Members cannot challenge them. Bearing that in mind, will you take steps to ensure that we have an opportunity to raise the matter with the appropriate Secretary of State so that hon. Members on both sides of the House may ask questions about this controversial change in planning consent?

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there are several dozen written questions tabled for answer every day.

Mr. Skinner: It is a big 'un.

Mr. Speaker: It may be a big 'un, but we had better wait to find out what the answer is.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It relates to the Opposition Supply day debate on the takeover bid for Rowntree. As you know, Mr. Speaker, hon. Members are debarred from voting on matters in which they have a direct pecuniary interest. The Government's amendment, in effect, allows, indeed encourages, a takeover bid by Nestlé. The effect of the takeover bid has been to increase share values. Therefore, any Conservative Member who has shares who voted for the amendment would be voting to enhance his pecuniary interest. May I suggest that you call on hon. Members who are in that position not to vote in the debate?

Mr. Speaker: I can clarify the issue. Any hon. Member who has an interest in any of the companies should declare it in the debate. On a question of public policy, it has always been in order for hon. Members to vote.

Alcohol (Health Warning)

3.38 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require the display of a health warning label on all products containing alcohol and to require the display of such notices in licensed premises.

I should make it clear from the beginning that I like a drink myself and I am certainly not approaching this subject from a puritanical point of view. Indeed, for those who believe that alcohol is the devil's brew, I would remind them of the miracle of the wedding feast where Jesus Christ turned water into wine. Presumably he could have turned it into Rowntree's cocoa or Nestlé's coffee, but for reasons that I would not dare to question he chose wine.

The labelling with a Government health warning of alcohol products for consumption is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I would draw the House's attention to early-day motion 599 in that regard. I am confident that it is only a matter of time before such a measure is adopted. The reasoning behind the proposal is both self-evident and self-explanatory. Drinking alcohol is injurious to health and dependency starts at a very low level of intake. The medical royal colleges recently stated that safe weekly consumption is the equivalent of 10½ pints for men and the equivalent of 7½ pints for women. Those who drink every day—that goes for many people in this House and no doubt many people in the country—are probably on target for some form of alcohol-related illness.

Alcohol is a killer, both directly and indirectly, and reports from the medical royal colleges suggest that at least 25,000, and probably 40,000, deaths a year are linked to excessive or inappropriate drinking.

I accept that long statistical lists are somewhat tedious, but all the available statistics show the growing seriousness of alcohol abuse in this country. A variety of published studies has shown that alcohol abuse is associated with 52 per cent. of deaths from fires, two thirds of suicides, 62 per cent. of serious head injuries among males—[Interruption.] There will be a few more if hon. Members do not listen more carefully to what I am saying. Moreover, alcohol abuse is associated with 45 per cent. of fatal road accidents involving young people, 36 per cent. of road traffic accidents involving pedestrians, one third of all domestic accidents, 30 per cent. of non-traffic accident fatalities and 30 per cent. of drownings. It is a horrendous list, and if hon. Members would like more statistics they can consult the report prepared by two young constituents of mine in Newham, Moira Bramley and Susan Withers, who I know are taking a close interest in this afternoon's proceedings.

A recent study at the university of York by Professor Alan Maynard calculated that at 1985 prices the annual cost to society arising—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the House to listen carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has to say about this important matter?

Mr. Banks: I put it all down to heavy lunches, Mr. Speaker.

Professor Maynard estimated that the annual cost arising from alcohol abuse was a staggering £1,846 million —or £5 million a day. Included in that figure are costs to industry, costs to the National Health Service—about one in five of all admissions are now alcohol related—and costs related to damage arising from road accidents and criminal activities.

Every year at Christmas the Government launch a very welcome campaign to try to reduce drinking and driving. Unfortunately, it concentrates on only one aspect—the indirect consequences of drinking. I believe that the campaign should also cover the direct consequences of drinking excessively and it should be a round-the-year campaign.

Alcohol consumption in the United Kingdom is increasing dramatically in all drink categories. That is especially true of our annual consumption of wine, which has increased by no less than 2,945 per cent. since 1945, according to Customs and Excise figures. The consumption of alcohol has doubled in the past 25 years. While many other countries are actively trying to respond to the call by the World Health Organisation to reduce that figure by 25 per cent. by the year 2000, the United Kingdom is doing the very opposite. The United Kingdom now has a higher per capita consumption of alcohol than the Soviet Union, Finland and Poland—all countries generally accepted in the public mind as having a serious alcohol problem.

It is not really surprising that alcohol consumption has increased so dramatically bearing in mind the additional outlets that are now available for the purchase of alcohol. According to Home Office statistics, between 1973 and 1986 the number of on and off-licence premises increased by 32 per cent. The Government themselves are busy increasing availability by the easing of licensing controls. In addition, while consumption has doubled in the past 25 years, the real price of alcohol has been halved.

The most worrying aspect of all is the incidence of alcohol abuse among young people in the 15 to 24 age range. People under 25 years drink more than those in any other age group. It is calculated that 31 per cent. of men and 23 per cent. of women began drinking before the age of 15. Furthermore, 1,000 children under the age of 15 are admitted to hospital each year with acute alcohol intoxication. Clearly the laws governing the sale of alcohol need to be more rigorously enforced.

Although other age groups can now expect to live longer, there is currently a reduced life expectancy for the 16 to 24 age group due to the rising number of deaths resulting from drink-related accidents. An enormous amount of slick advertising is aimed at encouraging drinking among the young. The industry admits that about £200 million a year is spent on advertising—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the club below the Gangway contain itself?

Mr. Banks: The drinks industry admits to spending £200 million a year on advertising, but I believe that to be a gross under-estimate. It does not appear to include the money that it spends on sports sponsorship, where the brand names are clearly displayed. Advertisements for drinks such as Martini, gin, Pernod and Bacardi are aimed at creating a glamorous image associated with expensive cars, money, sun-drenched beaches, travel—like the Foreign Secretary—and life in the fast lane generally. Beer and lager advertisements are aimed at the macho image. All drinking is associated with fun and glamour rather than with the sordid picture that the statistics clearly reveal.

If the House granted me leave to introduce the Bill, it would have to be part of an education programme pointing out the dangers of drinking. People generally, but especially the young, do not believe that alcohol is dangerous because they think that if it was the Government would do something about it. That is a rather simple view. The Government have committed £17 million to the drugs campaign, but less than £1·5 million to combating alcohol abuse. To put the figures into perspective, there were 235 deaths from illicit drug use but at least 25,000 deaths from alcohol abuse in 1984—the year for which figures are available. We need a general public information campaign along the lines of those aimed at combating drugs and AIDS.

If my Bill were to become operative, it would require that all bottles and cans displayed labels saying, "HM Government warning—alcohol can seriously damage your health." A notice to that effect would also have to be prominently displayed in all licensed premises, and on all wine lists in bars, clubs and restaurants.

I realise that the drinks industry is politically powerful, with many friends in this House and elsewhere, and also that it gives very generously to the Conservative party. I trust that neither of those facts will prevent the House from dealing with the growing crisis of alcohol abuse. I am not advocating prohibition—that would be both unrealistic and hypocritical because, as I have already said, I like a drink. I am certainly not trying to interfere with the freedom of individuals. I am merely asking that people be advised, at the point of consumption, about the damaging consequences, both directly and indirectly, of drinking alcohol.

The Bill should be only part of a vital education programme aimed at making excessive drinking as socially unacceptable as smoking is now becoming.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

Mr. Banks: Mr. Ronnie Fearn, Ms. Joyce Quin, Mr. Harry Cohen, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. George Galloway, Mr. Robin Corbett, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. Julian Critchley, Mr. Peter L. Pike, Mr. Barry Jones—and far too many more to mention.

Mr. Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. Banks: Friday 8 July—the slaughter of the innocents day.

Mr. Speaker: Let us just say Friday 8 July.

ALCOHOL (HEALTH WARNING)

Mr. Tony Banks accordingly presented a Bill to require the display of a health warning label on all products containing alcohol and to require the display of such notices in licensed premises: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 July and to be printed. [Bill 175.]

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That the matter of Health in Scotland, being a matter relating exclusively to Scotland, be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

Rowntree plc

Mr. Speaker: No fewer than 22 hon. Members are seeking to participate in this short debate, and I appeal for brief contributions from both the Front and Back Benches. I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.50 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I beg to move,

That this House condemns the failure to refer the Swiss bids for Rowntree to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; regrets that a matter of crucial importance to the Rowntree workforce and to the local communities affected, and which involves the national interest, is to be decided only according to the narrow interests of institutional shareholders; deplores the fact that an important regionally based enterprise is now likely to be absorbed by a Swiss-based multinational; notes that, unlike Swiss companies, British companies are extremely vulnerable to hostile takeovers; and calls upon the Government to adopt merger and competition policies which allow British industry to prepare effectively for 1992 without the constant threat of predatory takeover bids.

We have initiated this debate because we wish to express our disappointment and anger at the Government's failure to refer the bids for Rowntree to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That decision represents a betrayal of thousands of people who work in British industry, and a betrayal of all those who wish to see a bright future for that same British industry—particularly given the opportunities which the advent of 1992 and the internal market will present.

That failure represents also a missed opportunity to pause and reflect, to make a proper assessment of where the national interest lies, and to take into account the developing circumstances—which mean that, if this bid goes through, there will be a veritable queue of predators waiting to take their chance in the same way.

That failure came as a great disappointment to, and dashed the hopes of, Rowntree's 13,000 employees. To them, it meant a total denial of their interests. They were, typically, the last people to be consulted, the last to be kept informed, and the last to have their interests taken into account. It is typical of the Government that matters of such importance should be left exclusively to nameless and faceless institutional shareholders, and that the interests of those whose livelihoods depend, day by day, on the ownership of Rowntree should be totally ignored.

Rowntree's 13,000 work force has had to be content instead with airy assurances from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that their jobs are not at risk.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South) rose——

Mr. Gould: No, I shall not give way. I have only just begun, and the hon. Gentleman must be a little more patient.

The work force has had to be content with assurances based on no evidence or information, as far as one can tell, and carrying no certainty, that jobs are not at risk. Yet those people know the truth, because the food and drink industry, more than any other, has been the victim of merger mania. The employees of Rowntree know from bitter experience that when mergers of this type take place, the catchword has almost always been "rationalisation". They know also that rationalisation has proved in almost every case to be a euphemism for job losses, laying off and redundancies.

[Mr. Gould]

They know that in many cases there have been unmistakeable signs pointing to the need for exactly that kind of slimming down. Where the price offered by a predator is much higher than the market price so that the predator is paying over the odds, it stands to reason, and follows as a matter of logic, that at one point or another the new owners must recoup the premium they paid and get their money back. On almost every occasion in the past, that has meant cutting costs, and it has almost always meant cutting jobs.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West) rose——

Mr. Gould: No, I shall not give way.

That is why the work force at Rowntree is right to be concerned about jobs and why it is right not to place any reliance on the assurances given by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding) rose——

Mr. Gould: I will give way in a moment, but first I want to get into my speech.

The second great disappointment which flows from the failure of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to refer this matter to the commission was the blow, which so many Government Members recognised when the original statement was made, to the regional economy. The local authorities are in no doubt about that. They held a quasi-historic meeting in York on the day of the announcement and, to their very great credit, a number of Conservative Members, including the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory), made it clear that they, too, recognised the regional significance of what was happening. The hon. Member for York used the telling phrase "regional assassination", which is one we endorse. [Interruption.] Let it be clear to those who groan and show no interest in this point that Rowntree is one of only 13 of Britain's top 100 companies to have its headquarters in the regions. We have seen already what has happened in the regions as a consequence of mergers. Scotland, for example, has lost Bells, Distillers, Britoil and Coats and Paton as a consequence of mergers and takeovers. There are many more instances in other parts of the country. That regional element, of such great importance to the north of this country, will certainly be lost if and when Rowntree becomes simply a satellite of a Swiss multinational corporation.

Let me quote someone who, although he may not cut much ice with my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), may persuade some Conservative Members. Sir Hector Laing, writing in The Times less than a week ago, said:

"If too many of our major companies are taken over by non-British owners, and free market forces make that more rather than less likely, then the UK will become increasingly a satellite economy, with decision-makers based elsewhere."

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Would the hon. Gentleman describe a satellite company as one that employs more people in the United Kingdom than in Switzerland? Is it not a telling point that at present Nestlé employs more people in the United Kingdom than in Switzerland?

Mr. Gould: That point, which had certainly not escaped my notice, simply demonstrates that we are dealing with a very powerful and widely extended multinational, and that the takeover would not mean decision-making in York or even in London, but decision-making in Zurich or Lausanne. That is what is significant and important.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Gould: No, I wish to finish the point.

That is why the takeover would mean not only economic loss to the region in terms of pounds and pence, but loss in terms of skills and decision-making power. I am sorry that so many Conservative Members seem unaware of that important regional dimension.

Mr. John Marshall: Can the hon. Gentleman square his comments with the fact that on 13 May, when the European Parliament was voting on whether to have an emergency debate on the bid by Nestlé for Rowntree, British Labour Members of the European Parliament voted against holding such a debate, and Dr. Barry Seal, a prominent member of the British Labour group, said at a press conference that the best hope for Rowntree was a bid by Nestlé?

Mr. Gould: I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would recognise more clearly his responsibilities to his own constituency. Let me make it clear that I have no doubt whatever that Labour Members of the European Parliament would vote for the motion we have tabled today.

The failure to refer the bid is a great disappointment to a successful British company. I know that there is always a temptation to treat companies in Rowntree's position as though they were paragons of every conceivable virtue, but the fact is that Rowntree is and has been a profitable, well-managed company with good industrial relations and a good record of investment. It has had great success in building up its brand names. It has shown great marketing flair. It is well poised to take every advantage of the great opportunities, so often lauded by Conservative Members, that are opening up with the advent of the internal market in 1992.

But that company finds that, as a consequence of the Government's irresponsibility, it is denied the opportunity to exploit those advantages. It finds that the Swiss, who have been so much less effective in competing in these markets, have decided to buy what they cannot build. The Swiss have decided, by means of acquisitions, to eliminate a powerful rival and acquire a market share that they could not otherwise obtain.

I believe that that is an indictment of the Government's cavalier attitude towards the interests of successful British companies. If Nestlé acquires Rowntree, the danger is that it will simply dissipate the great achievements which have been worked for for so long by that company. There is the real danger that production will be moved elsewhere. I wonder how many hon. Members are aware that, even under Rowntree's management, major brands in the ownership of Rowntree are being manufactured abroad. For example, Quality Street is being manufactured in Dijon and After Eight in Hamburg. How much greater scope for that diversification and for that removal of manufacturing capacity if the owners are not a York-based company but a Swiss-based multinational.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): The hon. Member keeps saying that the only way that Nestlé can recoup its investment is by dissipating Rowntree's assets. Surely, if one pays more than the assets' book value, one cannot recoup one's investment by dissipating them. The only way one can make them profitable is by bringing the two companies together to make them more profitable than they were individually.

Mr. Gould: With respect to the hon. Member, I did not say that Nestlé would recoup its outlay by dissipating Rowntree's assets. I said that it would reduce Rowntree's costs and would therefore lay off jobs. It can retain the benefits and assets by manufacturing elsewhere.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Gould: I have given way often enough. This is a short debate, in which many others wish to speak.

I will pursue the theme of disappointment, because, not least among those disappointments, as a consequence of the Secretary of State's decision, was the disappointment of those people who hoped that at last we might obtain some sign from the Government of a constructive and coherent competition and mergers policy. Those hopes have been gravely dashed by this decision.

In 1984, the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), said that the essence of competition policy was competition. One might have thought that that was not the most helpful indicator of where the Government's policy was leading us. However, there were then some wobbles. Elders' bid for Allied Lyons and the Kuwaiti shareholding in BP were referred. The criteria seemed to become more complex. There was at least some hope that the Government were at last prepared to take proper account of the public and national interest.

The problem is that, with this decision, we are back to a situation in which the only element that appears to weigh with the Secretary of State is how he feels when he gets up in the morning. We have little guidance from the Secretary of State as to what criteria he will use in making essential decisions. The danger is that he does not appear to have recognised the growing European dimension. There is every sign that the Government, in their naive enthusiasm for 1992, are losing sight of the fact that, even in that context, there remains an identifiable British national and public interest which it is the Government's responsibility to protect.

The confused state of merger policy, as a consequence of this decision, is not just a matter of substance. It is also a matter of the procedures that are followed. There will be sympathy on both sides of the House for the Rowntree board's complaint that, as a consequence of the time that was taken and the uncertainty that arose between 26 April and the decision not to refer to the Mergers and Monopolies Commission, the Swiss predators were able to build up their shareholding from 21 per cent. to 43 per cent., in circumstances in which Rowntree were powerless to resist.

That happened because shareholders knew—given that there was a chance that a reference would be made—that they had to move swiftly to accept an offer that might not survive. That meant that, in the intervening four weeks or so, Rowntree was unable to stop the rot. Far from confronting a minority shareholding, it confronted the fact that Swiss predators had virtually obtained control before the matter could be decided.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I have been following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely. Will he agree that one of the problems is that we are talking about 1992 and mergers policy? Rowntree and Cadbury might well have wished to merge in the United Kingdom, but would have been considered a British monopoly. Under the 1992 policy, they would not have been a European monopoly. Therefore, a great opportunity has been lost for those two great companies to get together. It is now too late and, unless the policy changes, it will be too late for other companies as well.

Mr. Gould: I suspect that the situation of Cadbury is worrying from a different viewpoint. Many people fear that, as a consequence of this decision, the next victim being lined up is indeed Cadbury.

The problem is that the decision not to refer this bid is not only a source of disappointment to all the groups I have identified, but also a cause of unease as to what it portends. That unease is widely shared in the House. Again, I pray in aid Sir Hector Laing, who in that same article said:

> "It seems that in the present climate, any and all of British industry is for sale if the price is right. 'Prostitution' is not a pretty word. I am sure we will not sell ourselves cheap, but at any price it is still prostitution."

Even in the face of that stinging rebuke from one of the grandees of the Conservative party, the Government persist in placing their faith entirely in market forces. They glorify market forces as the only arbiter—virtually a moral arbiter—and as the rewarder of those who are virtuous and the penaliser of those who deserve nothing better. The Government take the view that, right or wrong, whatever the market does, however much it cuts across the public or national interest, it must nevertheless prevail. The irony is that the evidence that the Government surveyed in their paper on merger policy lends no support to the view that mergers are in the companies' interest or in the national interest. In fact, the reverse is true.

That paper concluded the appendix on the academic evidence by saying:

> "Evidence on post-merger performance . . . supports the earlier findings of disappointing or inconclusive performance. Indeed, the consistency of the results of the various studies and the wide range of approaches used tends to reduce the force of the methodological limitations and to increase the robustness of the findings."

Those findings were that, far from improving their performance, companies involved in mergers were less efficient than the average of those in other countries.

What is true of individual companies is also true of the entire economy. Merger mania reinforces the short-termism of which even the Chancellor of the Exchequer has on occasion complained. It reinforces the emphasis on short-term liquidity and performance. It militates against the kind of long-term investment that is so essential to our industrial performance. It also militates against the essential spending on research and development and on training on which our industrial future so closely depends.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) pointed out, all of that will become a more pressing problem as we approach 1992. We are already a more open market than any other in Europe. By virtue of our open stock market, the market for what is now fashionably called corporate control is freer here than it is anywhere else. Whereas in our country virtually any public listed company can be bid for and obtained if the price is right, in countries such as Germany and Switzerland that is not possible. Hostile bids are virtually unknown, because the way in which industry is financed is different.

The close nexus between banks and financial institutions on the one hand and industrial ownership on the other makes it virtually impossible for a hostile bid to succeed in those countries. Our successful companies have no protection because of the way in which they are structured. Their only protection rests with the law—the Government. The Government are responsible for maintaining the public interest and protecting that interest. If that is not done, then our companies are defenceless in a way that does not arise in other European economies.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover) rose—

Mr. Gould: I shall not give way again.

In the case of Rowntree, this decision means that the Government appear deliberately to have turned their back on their responsibility to protect British industry in this way. They have clearly declared that it is open season, that anything goes, that the "for sale" notice is up and that there is a price tag on everything.

The approach of 1992 makes it more likely that the combination of our own openness and the Government's dereliction of duty will mean that huge numbers of British companies will be at risk and that the predators from both within and outside the EC will be queuing up to take their chances. The pity of it is that it is the best and most successful British companies—the companies which have invested, which have good records, which have developed powerful brands in European markets and which are best able to take advantage of the opportunities of the internal market—which will be in the firing line and will be picked off, without the Government lifting a finger to help them.

The Government are bemused and obsessed by their ideological commitment to market forces and their loyalty to international capital. We in the Labour party and those who are concerned about British industry and the regional economy are left to express and fight the case for those interests because the Government clearly have no more concern or interest in such matters.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle) rose—

Mr. Gould: No, I shall not give way; I am about to finish.

The worrying thing is that, behind Rowntree, comes Cadbury. I met the unions from Cadbury this morning. They know that the writing is on the wall. General Cinema already has a substantial shareholding and we cannot be sure what its intentions are. We know that predators will be sniffing around. Behind Cadbury are legions of other British companies, every one of which must now be frightened that the Government have abandoned them to their fate. That is the tragedy, the great weakness, the failure and the disappointment of the Secretary of State's decision.

With this debate and motion, we are providing an opportunity to say, "Enough is enough." Some limits must be established to protect British industry where it needs that protection and, above all, to encourage British industry where encouragement will open up the opportunities that we so desperately need. It may be unfashionable, but we shall say loud and clear from the Opposition Benches—we hope to hear some echo from Conservative Members—that there is still an identifiable British interest, which must be sustained, protected and encouraged.

We are not prepared to see British industry sold off to the highest bidder and to become simply a satellite economy with no power to control our own future or the development of our own economy. That is why we tabled the motion and why we believe that the Government's failure to refer the bid is a sign of so much worse to come and of such dereliction of duty. That is why we ask hon. Members of all parties to support the motion, in the interests of British industry and all those whose livelihoods depend on it.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'recognises the benefits which inward and outward investment have brought to the British economy: endorses the Government's merger policy as set out in the Department of Trade and Industry's paper on the policy and procedures of merger control published on 3rd March 1988; and supports the decision not to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission Nestle's bid for Rowntree or Suchard's 29.9 per cent. holding in Rowntree, as being consistent with that policy.'

I enjoy being shadowed by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and am always interested in taking part in debates with him. However, I continue to be startled by the contrast that steadily emerges between the reputation of the hon. Gentleman outside the House for the views that he holds, and the views that he puts forward in the House on behalf of the Labour party. He is alleged and believed to be one of those in his party who is seeking to edge the Labour movement a little nearer to the days of a free market economy and an enterprise economy. Every time that he—[Interruption.] Well, I am probably doing a great deal of good for the hon. Gentleman's reputation in some quarters—[Interruption.] It is relevant. The fact is that every time that he speaks here on a particular issue he belies that reputation.

Insofar as the assertions that the hon. Gentleman has made today about monopolies and mergers policy in his approach to takeovers shed light on the policies of the Labour party, they take that party right back to where it was in the 1970s, if not before, and miles away from the present position.

Insofar as the hon. Gentleman's arguments led to any view of an overall approach to monopolies and mergers, they not only spoke strongly against any kind of foreign takeover of any British company because that would make us a satellite economy, but the hon. Gentleman was against most inward investment especially if the company had headquarters outside London. On the whole, the hon. Gentleman would rule out mergers that would have any effect on regional companies. By the time the hon. Gentleman finished, it was clear that in most instances he was against the free movement of capital, and against takeovers and mergers.

If the hon. Gentleman were to refer cases on the basis that he put forward, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission would have to acquire several tower blocks to hold the staff to deal with the applications. The hon. Gentleman would also have to change the law dramatically to make the Monopolies and Mergers Commission recognise his view of economics, British public interest and industrial policy and to start turning down some mergers.

Mr. Gould: I enjoy shadowing the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but I cannot let him get away with such a ridiculous failure to distinguish between inward investment and resisting a hostile bid. Will he now admit that such a distinction is important and does exist?

Mr. Clarke: Does it follow from that that the hon. Gentleman is saying that only friendly takeovers will be allowed? I suspect that, in the case of companies based outside London, only friendly takeovers from British companies would be allowed if a London-based company were trying to buy a regional one. Such an approach is wrong. It is important that we begin by clarifying our views on takeover policy and of the situation of one company bidding for another company if the recipient is unwilling to receive the bid——

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Clarke: I apologise to my hon. Friend, but I must try—as did the hon. Member for Dagenham—to resist interventions because otherwise I shall take too long.

The Conservative party believes that the greatest national public interest lies in allowing such things to take place within the market place. Such judgments are best taken by shareholders, who make a judgment about the likely performance of the companies in which they have a stake. The free flow of capital, both internally and internationally, leads to the best use of national resources in the longer term.

Regardless of the nationality or the location of the company, the very logic of a takeover bid, if one thinks it through, amounts to a bidder who believes that he can produce a better return than the so-called victim is producing under the existing management. The bidder puts up his own money, or that of his backers, to demonstrate his confidence in that judgment. It is the shareholder who makes the judgment about the prospects of the company in new hands. In a free market economy, and in the opinion of the Government, there is no need to stop that process in the vast majority of cases.

We all know that in almost every instance the management at the receiving end of the uncovenanted bid will not wish it to come in, and normally the work force will not either. We can all understand that if we put ourselves in the position, especially of the managers, but also of the work force of the company at the receiving end. It is disturbing to have such a bid. It is much more satisfactory to hope that it will not take place. However, we believe that that is one of the commercial pressures that managements of quoted companies should be under because it is a spur to efficiency and leads to the improved competitiveness of the economy.

We pay this country's top managers highly and we have reduced their taxation. In part the high remuneration that keeps such managers in this country is compensation for the risks that they run and for the day-to-day commercial pressures that I have described. Those in management in private industry are not entitled to look for jobs for life. They defend their jobs by retaining the confidence of their shareholders by demonstrating the good performance of their company. Everybody benefits if that is the case.

We must appreciate that such cases do not normally justify intervention. Any hon. Member who finds that a company in the locality of his constituency is affected by a takeover bid is usually approached by that company's managers and often by the work force and trade unions, seeking some political defence against the threat. The wariness of managers and their willingness to approach their Member of Parliament to tell the work force and to help them to defend the company has nothing to do with the nationality of the company making the hostile bid. The natural and instinctive reaction of companies at the receiving end of such bids is to resist them.

As the hon. Member for Dagenham said, what is required on the part of the Government is a consistent view of when it is necessary to regulate and to step in because the national interest is genuinely adversely affected by the proposal. That is why we have a clear competition law and the power to refer bids to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That is why we take the objective advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. We have set out a policy because it is necessary to be consistent. It is in the Blue Paper to which the hon. Gentleman referred, which showed that he has read it at last. It was not debated seriously when we produced it. That is the consistent policy that we are applying.

All examinations of competition policy have found that, if one wishes to protect the genuine public interest, the key issue on which to concentrate is ensuring that one protects above all the consumer and the customer against monopoly and that one maintains a healthy state of competition in the economy. That is not the only reason. Wider powers are reserved for companies that have some strategic importance to the economy.

We have repeatedly made clear our consistent policy. It is wrong for the hon. Member for Dagenham to attack us for lack of clarity. The fact is that the Labour party has not thought through the issues that I have outlined about takeovers and mergers. It is reacting in a populist, ad hoc way wherever it sees political advantage in a particular town by arousing fears about a particular takeover. Let us imagine that we returned to the practices that were adopted at times by the previous Labour Government. Proposals such as the Rowntree takeover would be subjected to delay and scrutiny by politicians and their agencies. Whenever trade union, local or regional lobbies were established, great damage would be done to the free flow of investment in the economy as well as to the economy.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark rose——

Mr. Clarke: I always overrun my speeches because I give way too often. I shall follow the lead of the hon. Member for Dagenham and will resist interventions even from my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark), whom I respect so much.

The Government believe that the bid for Rowntree is a perfectly ordinary takeover. We agree with the Director General of Fair Trading that there is no reason for the Government to intervene and nothing to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. I anticipate that the MMC would find nothing to question about the bid were it ever referred to it. It does not mean that the Government are taking any view about who should own Rowntree. We believe there is no public interest in the case which justifies any suggestion of overriding the judgment of the shareholders. They will determine where they believe the future of the company best lies.

[Mr. Clarke]

Essentially our critics have made a great issue of this case for two reasons—and for the purpose of an analysis I am aware that I shall simplify the sophisticated arguments. The first reason is that the bid is a foreign one from a country outside the European Community. The hon. Member for Dagenham is always the voice of reason, but, however much he may deny it, if the bid was not a foreign one we should not be bothering with this debate. Chauvinism runs strongly throughout this issue. The second ingenious and interesting argument is that no reciprocal bid could be made by a British chocolate company should it wish to buy a company in Switzerland. I accept both those arguments. Unless the hon. Member for Dagenham is trying to widen this debate against all takeovers, all foreign bids and against the takeover of all regional companies, he is saying that because it is a Swiss bid and because there is no reciprocity it should be referred.

The hon. Member for Dagenham laid great stress on the British interest. I accept that there is enough national feeling in this country for caution to be aroused in the minds of many whenever a foreign bid is made. The British interest should govern what we do and should guide the House in reaching its decisions. I believe that undoubtedly it is in the British interest that we should have the freest possible movement of inward and outward investment. Britain must remain on the side of open international capital markets. In recent years it has become clear that, probably with the sole exception of the United States, we have the most open trading system. That system has worked overwhelmingly to the benefit of the British economy and of British workers.

If we suddenly start to adopt a "little Englander" approach, we shall put behind us recent events that have meant that, second only to the United States, the British are the main acquirers of companies throughout the world. We are the main overseas investors to the great benefit of the British economy. The total accumulated value of British direct investment overseas is double the value of all foreign direct investment in the United Kingdom. The Labour party, provoked by one of my hon. Friends, seems to be against such large-scale British investment overseas.

Let us consider our record. In 1986 the United Kingdom invested approximately £12 billion in overseas markets, making us the world's second largest investor after the United States. That brought total United Kingdom net assets overseas to about £90 billion, or 21 per cent. of our gross domestic product. In 1986 the United Kingdom earned a net £7·7 billion as a result of direct overseas investment. It is forecast that those earnings will increase to £10·8 billion for 1987. We are one of the great overseas investors and the British economy is benefiting greatly by the inward flow of earnings from such investment. Nationalism will, of course, produce retaliation.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): From time to time the right hon. and learned Gentleman gives advice that my constituents find unacceptable. He has done it again this afternoon when he talked about the "little Englander" approach. Is he aware that there are jobs outwith England? He gratuitously insulted management in various parts of the United Kingdom. Alas, some of them voted Conservative at the last election, including, unfortunately, some of my constituents. Those people have committed themselves to their industry. Does he believe it is right to deny them the opportunity to express a view about jobs? What is his view and the Government's view about future jobs in this country?

Mr. Clarke: The number of jobs being created in this country now exceeds that for the rest of western Europe. We have had the biggest single fall in unemployment in western Europe: unemployment has been falling at an amazing rate. That has happened because we are a successful free market economy operating an open trading system. The £10 billion in earnings from our overseas investments is contributing to the well-being of the economy. Inward investment brings jobs, and that is another great advantage of our open trading system.

We shall invite retaliation if we start suddenly to become nationalistic about takeovers. The hon. Member for Dagenham said that we run the risk of Britain becoming a satellite economy. The leader of the Labour party has said the same thing. He has said that Britain is for sale abroad and is becoming an offshoot of American and other foreign companies. The reverse is true. We are at the core of the international economy. There is no evidence that we are losing our dominant position. The idea that we are not in the big league is entirely wrong. Of the 500 largest non-oil companies in whe world, 23 are French, 38 are German and 53 are British. We are by no means a satellite economy. We are the major predator of overseas companies.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am following my right hon. and learned Friend's argument, with much of which I agree. We are an island with a progressive economy and we are taking over many overseas companies. We hold $98 billion worth of investment in America alone. Such investment strengthens our economy and that of the world.

It is important to consider, however, the problems of Rowntree and Cadbury. The other day my right hon. and learned Friend did not like me describing the old monopolies and mergers policy as a shambles, but does he not agree that under that policy Rowntree and Cadbury would never have got together because they would have held more than 50 per cent. of the United Kingdom confectionery industry? They would have been thrown into the hands of the MMC. That means that when Suchard, Nestlé, General Cinema or anyone else comes along our home industries compete with one hand tied behind their back while they are gripped warmly by the throat by foreign competitors. Is it not the job of the Government to say that we have one monopolies and mergers policy that applies to home and overseas takeovers so that British companies can compete on the same basis as foreign companies? That is all we ask.

Mr. Clarke: I shall come to the question of reciprocity in a moment. My hon. Friend slipped into somewhat dramatic language because of his local concern for one of the companies. His favourite solution of a merger between Cadbury and Rowntree has never been put to the test. I cannot envisage what would have been the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading or what the MMC would have said.

There is nothing wrong with a competition policy which put in the forefront the protection of the customer against the building of a strong monopoly position in the United Kingdom market, particularly if the commodity which is being traded is one for which there is a particular British taste. What the hon. Gentleman is advocating may protect the management of Cadbury and Rowntree from overseas bids, but if a merger between them were ever suggested we would have to judge whether it was in the national interest and what effect it would have on the customer. The fact that it would be a merger between two British companies rather than between a British and a Swiss company is irrelevant. The same tests apply to all: what is in the interests of the British economy, and what is the advantage to the customer?

In reply to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), may I say that we must not ignore the effects of inward investment. It is running at a much lower level than outward investment as we buy companies from abroad and it brings jobs. In the north-east of England, for example, there is no resistance to Japanese investment. In the past 15 years 80 Japanese companies have produced more than 25,000 jobs. We are not having our British industry taken over by foreigners on a grand scale. The proportion of our work force working for overseas-owned companies steadily drops because there has been an increase in British investment here. In 1979, 15 per cent. of our manufacturing work force worked for overseas-owned companies whereas by 1985 the figure had dropped to 14 per cent.

The nationality of companies is becoming increasingly irrelevant in modern trading conditions. We are obsessed with where companies have their headquarters and the corporate law under which they operate when that has ever less effect. The case was being based on the job consequences of having a company based perhaps in Zurich rather than York. Everybody knows that Nestlé employs more people here than in Switzerland. It has been established here for over 100 years and enjoys a great deal of support from the people in constituencies where it operates.

What is less well known is the position of Rowntree. It is being said that if the company is not based in York it will employ people abroad. Rowntree employs more people outside than inside the United Kingdom. It employs 15,500 people in the United Kingdom and 17,500 abroad. That position has undoubtedly been increased slightly by the acquisition of a French company, Candice Martial, at the end of last year. Therefore, the idea that a headquarters in York means that employment is secure in the East Riding is a mistake. To look at the alleged nationality of a company is chauvinistic nonsense.

Nestlé is described as a foreign predator and it is no use hon. Members denying their emphasis on the foreign aspect. My hon. Friend the Member for Selly Oak got carried away when talking about foreign companies with their hands around the throats of good little British companies.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I was not having a go at Nestlé.

Mr. Clarke: I hope that my hon. Friend was not having a go at Nestlé. Not only has it been here for over 100 years but it makes good products such as Worcestershire sauce, Ashbourne water and Branston pickle as well as Nescafé. [Interruption.] Some Labour Members may deride all those products as foreign muck from now on and may organise a boycott of them in the Tea Room, but that will not be of much advantage to them.

I shall leave aside what I regard as nationalist nonsense and address the arguments about reciprocity. When this came to a head, the reciprocity issue caused considerable anxiety in the House. What is the position when a company is at the receiving end of a hostile bid but cannot make a counter-bid because of the capital structure of the company making the bid? That position is not confined to overseas companies. It has nothing to do with British and Swiss law, or anything of that nature.

Swiss law on the subject is similar to our law. Swiss Ministers have less power over these matters than British Ministers. No Swiss Minister can step in to stop a British bid as my right hon. Friend could if he thought that he was jusified in using his powers. It is Swiss practice which differs from ours, but only in degree. It is not unique to Switzerland and unknown in the United Kingdom. Countless British companies have a similar structure for one reason or another. Is anybody saying that no private company should ever be allowed to make an acquisition without a referral? What about Great Universal Stores, Trusthouse Forte, P and O and the National Freight Corporation? Their capital structure is such that, as with the Swiss, it protects them from bids.

What then is this argument that we should make a reference on the grounds of so-called reciprocity? Should we refer to the MMC any bid made by a company which is bid-proof? Does that include all those British companies? I have never heard that asserted, but it would be an interesting proposition and we shall hear whether any hon. Member advocates it. I do not think that that is being asserted. Some of my hon. Friends, understandably influenced by their Yorkshire or Birmingham connections, are saying, "You can't refer them all just because there is no counter-bid, but you should refer them when it is a foreign company that has this structure against which you cannot make a bid." I do not believe that that makes any sense or depicts a rational monopolies picture.

Even when my hon. Friends say, "Of course, we realise that it shouldn't be like that, but it would influence the Swiss position", I do not understand that. The desire to help the Swiss improve the undesirable nature of its stock exchange practice is deeply moving, but not the main motive of those who argue in that way. Underlying that is the belief that somehow we shall influence the Swiss to change their practice if we refer this bid for a chocolate company to the MMC. That rather assumes that if we refer the bid to the MMC it will find some ground for overruling the bid, but neither the director general nor the Government are clear what that would be. The argument is not sustainable when one thinks it through. To react in that way to this particular bid will not have the slightest effect on Swiss practice. It is an extraordinary way to try to go about altering Swiss practice. For those reasons, I do not believe that there is any serious point in reciprocity.

The final major point that will undoubtedly be raised is the European dimension to the problem. So far I have never understood clearly what people think that is. It is certainly true that the approach of 1992 combined with the booming state of our economy makes this look a good place to make money and is attracting inward investment. That is to be encouraged and it must be our aim to acquire a higher share of that than our European partners. It is also true that in the long run we shall no doubt look at a European-wide merger and competition policy as the new market develops. We are not ready for that yet, but we are taking part in the discussions on it.

I trust that no hon. Member will assert that the Common Market will be a protectionist Common Market or that the British should intervene on the European front, saying that non-EC bids should suddenly all be subject to some new restrictive EC policy. That would be a recipe for encouraging the decline of the European economy. We have a strong interest in maintaining and encouraging an open international flow of investment. 1992 will bring more of that to the United Kingdom. If our market is more open than that of the French, the Germans, the Belgians and so on, it will be an advantage to us.

Where does that leave us in this case? It is a straightforward takeover bid and it should be decided as all others are—by the shareholders considering the best interests of Rowntree. The fear that has been aroused among the work force is wholly misplaced. Some hon. Members have already intervened to point to the absurdity of claiming that a company will go to this length to acquire a major manufacturing base in the United Kingdom simply to close it down. The idea that rationalisation is more likely in the case of an acquisition by a foreign company that has rather different products, albeit chocolate, than by a British company operating in the same market with many more similar products is misplaced. All these are absurd arguments which are raising needless fears.

Earlier the hon. Member for Dagenham was not so certain. He asked why the bid should not have been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to be tested. That would have caused delay, uncertainty and rising alarm. At one point he was complaining about the effect of delay. He said that waiting for the advice of the director general allowed the share price to go up because people thought that there might be a reference to the MMC. Who raised the bogey of the reference to the MMC? It was being urged by Rowntree and by the Labour party. If it had the effect on the share price that the hon. Member for Dagenham claimed, it was caused by those like himself who were agitating for a reference to the MMC. To duck the issue and say that we should have referred the bid to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission just in case is absurd.

The advice of the hon. Member for Dagenham is not as bad as the appalling investment advice given by the leader of his party to Rowntree workers. It was unattractive that the Leader of the Opposition should lecture Rowntree workers about whether they should sell their shares. The reaction of the trade union and of the work force in York, Halifax and elsewhere has been more sensible than that of the Labour movement. The unions are discussing the matter seriously. They are putting their views to those making the bid and they are making representations to the shareholders. That is how the matter should be resolved. We should leave it to take its course. I do not believe that there is any case for taking a political decision to refer this to the MMC in the belief that a response to the kind of lobbying to which the hon. Member for Dagenham has been victim is a more sensible way of sorting out the problem.

4.40 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): The rather arrogant contribution of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which trivialised a serious debate affecting 3,000 of my constituents, exposed the Government's total lack of a coherent policy for industry. It equalled in callousness only the refusal of the Secretary of State to intervene or to do anything to allay the fears of people in my constituency. The message came across loud and clear that the Government could not care less about British industry and the people who work in it. The message has been clear —shareholders' greed and short-term interest rule. In the near future, we will see a repeat of what happened in the early 1980s, when in my constituency thousands and thousands of manufacturing jobs were thrown away.

I should like to take the Chancellor up on his latter remarks about the unions. The trade union members who decided to plead for a friendly takeover were doing so out of sheer desperation. They were not trying to accommodate the Government or big business.

The disgraceful statement by the unelected Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that he did not see any reason to be concerned about jobs will be long remembered. If that cannot be used as a criterion to protect jobs in all constituencies, I wonder what the Secretary of State thinks should be a criterion. It is ironic that just over 12 months ago I made my maiden speech on manufacturing. I pleaded with the Government to formulate a policy and to take a responsible attitude to the thousands of people who work in manufacturing. We have had the answer in recent weeks.

This is the tip of the iceberg. I am in the unfortunate position of representing a constituency where takeover and merger have already reared their heads. With respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), I cannot think too kindly of Sir Hector Laing and his utterances, because the events of recent weeks have shown that he is not a friend to industry. The Chancellor of the Duchy talked about inward investment. Sir Hector Laing and United Biscuits have singularly failed to make inward investment in Halifax. We are faced with the imminent closure of a factory and the loss of 1,000 jobs in KP Foods due directly to the fact that United Biscuits feels that because of 1992 it has to slim down to be more competitive. Yet the factory in Halifax increased its profits last year; it is a profitable factory and there is no good reason to close it.

However much the Chancellor of the Duchy trivalises the matter, from hard and bitter experience we are concerned when the headquarters of a company move out of the country. We know that, in any period of contraction, the so-called branch factories in other countries are the most vulnerable, and it becomes a case of out of sight, out of mind. The Chancellor of the Duchy should tell the House what his policies are for manufacturing.

Jobs will disappear not just in towns like Halifax, which the Government seem to have abandoned totally, but also in the so-called golden triangle of the south-east, as 1992 approaches. The Minister should tell the House what he intends to do about it. It will cost him dearly because that is where much of the Government's majority comes from.

I have talked to trade unionists and to people who work in the industries which will be adversely affected. People are beginning to understand the shallowness of a Government who allow a free market to decide whether they will have a right to work or whether they and their families will have to exist on benefit, without the right to work in the foreseeable future.

Then there is the almost cavalier way in which the City talks about this devastating decision. The aggressive term "dawn raider" is understood now in Halifax, because two more companies will shortly be shedding labour. The Reliance hosiery factory, which is part of the Corah group, is holding its breath. In Leicester, 600 jobs are to go and there will be up to 60 more redundancies this summer in the factory in my constituency. Coloroll is breathing down the neck of one of the last carpet manufacturers in Halifax. This is all because of the merger madness of a few wealthy people who want to make a lot of money and who do not care about anyone else.

All this is happening in spite of the fact that Halifax tried to drag itself up. We have been held up by Conservative Members as a model of ingenuity and entrepreneurial spirit. The Prime Minister praised us to the hilt recently when she paid a visit—albeit a clandestine one—to Halifax. She did not inform anyone that she was coming, but sneaked in and out. She held up Halifax as the focus of the long-term partnership of business with the community, launched with royal patronage and embraced with enthusiasm by everyone. We feel betrayed. Some of us were not taken in, but the vast majority will not be taken in again by candyfloss schemes and people like Sir Hector Laing who profess to care about the community.

The Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Duchy could have helped. They could have taken their responsibilities seriously. God knows, they are paid enough and they have enough privilege in their position. But they have decided not to do anything. The Chancellor of the Duchy has decided to abandon industry. He says that there is no hope. All he did this afternoon was try to score cheap party political points.

Mr. Bermingham: Does my hon. Friend agree also that the Chancellor of the Duchy was perhaps a little economical with the truth when, in outlining the openness of British policy, as well as not allowing anyone to intervene, he refused to explain why the Treasury Solicitor was briefed to try to warn off the trustees of the Rowntree trust who seemed to oppose the bid?

Mrs. Mahon: It seems to fall very much in line with everything that the Government do. I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention, which is now on the record.

In view of his performance in this debate, and because of his totally irresponsible attitude towards the work force, the Chancellor has forfeited any right to continue to hold his high office. He should do the honourable thing and resign.

4.50 pm

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): For several reasons, Rowntree is an important company. First, it is a vital part of the manufacturing base in York. About 5,500 people are employed there and that is one third of the city's manufacturing jobs. That is significant when one considers the reduction in jobs at British Rail Engineering Ltd. and the closure of Redfearn Glass in 1983, which once employed 1,000 people.

Secondly, Rowntree is important to the economy of Yorkshire. In that context, one looks not only at York but at Calderdale and Castleford. At Calderdale, 2,500 to 3,000 people are employed, depending on the season, and that represents an investment by Rowntree of over £20 million. Rowntree is the largest employer in Castleford, with 650 employees. The company has invested there in the largest chocolate-making factory in Europe and further development is likely.

Thirdly, the company makes an important contribution to the local economy. Rowntree has always encouraged its managers to participate in local affairs, whether in chambers of commerce, enterprise agencies or local schools. It maintains local charitable donations which are an example to any company. Specific examples could include the help for applied biology at York university and the Calderdale partnership of Business in the Community. Many examples could be given of Rowntree's commitment and philanthropy to the local community.

Fourthly, Rowntree has its world headquarters in the north of England and is one of six companies of similar size that are based there. Together, Rowntree and Cadbury account for just under 30 per cent. of world trade in confectionery. Finally and significantly, Rowntree employs just under 13,000 people in the United Kingdom confectionery industry. For those reasons if for no other, it is vital that we fully debate the Swiss bids for the company.

Referral of this case would have given a chance for these new issues, especially reciprocity and Rowntree's place in the market, to be given very careful thought. Secondly, it would have given time to review this test case on merger policy ahead of 1992, a matter to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy has still not fully addressed his mind. It would have given the Government an opportunity to sign the EC directive on mergers. These public issues have been raised by some of my hon. Friends and especially by the Community Member for York, Edward McMillan Scott, who is an example to his colleagues in the European Assembly. The Government continue to shy away from these issues.

In the short time available to me, I should like to speak about mergers and reciprocity. This is the first case that shows the European Community's vulnerabilty in promoting 1992 before it has the necessary framework. I believe strongly in Europe and in Britain's place in it. It is an integrated trading bloc that is a natural market, and 1992 poses a challenge. Some British companies, such as Rowntree, are ready for it but some Governments are not. Britain has a useful strategy on mergers within the United Kingdom, but our nation has been slow in pushing for a European Community strategy.

If we are to remove the tariff barriers and other obstacles to free trade in the EC, our commitment must be mirrored by good bargaining. Aggressive bidders know that they are unlikely to succeed elsewhere in the European Community. The Swiss are particularly hostile because of their concern about exclusion from the Community. If we do not have a clearly defined policy on mergers that takes account of the size of companies, their share of the market and especially their potential for brands, then good

[Mr. Conal Gregory]

European companies will fall prey to further hostile Swiss bids. The picking off of a major confectionery company will be but the first of the British ripe cherries; pharmaceutical companies and others will follow suit. Today it is confectionery—the Polos and the Smarties—but tomorrow it will be pharmaceutical brands. Despite good brands and good staff and its enviable record on research and design, Rowntree has become vulnerable to the Swiss.

The answer to the problem lies partly in the European Community, which has a proposed regulation on mergers. It would require prior vetting of mergers where global turnover was in excess of £700 million and where the market share in the Community exceeded 20 per cent. Two states, Britain and France, have resisted that mergers policy. For five years, both have resisted a wider merger policy. If such a policy had been in place before these hostile bids occurred, the competition policy and reciprocity could have been examined by the Commission.

That brings me to the second vital area—reciprocity. Britain has a tradition of free and fair competition. We are a trading nation founded on free trade and not on one-sided cricket. We are still waiting to see examples of United Kingdom companies that have succeeded with a hostile bid in Switzerland. I would be quite happy to accept an intervention by my right hon. and learned Friend if he can give one example of a United Kingdom company that has succeeded with such a hostile bid. I shall be more generous and invite him to give an example of any European company that has succeeded with a hostile bid in Switzerland. I see that his special advisers are singularly unoccupied in scribbling an answer to that question, because there is no answer. They cannot find an example of a company that has succeeded in such a bid.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Would my hon. Friend say that any company which is proof against a hostile bid should not be allowed to take over another company? Would he apply that logic to companies such as Trusthouse Forte, P and O, Great Universal Stores and so on? Would he apply it to companies of any nationality? How does he imagine that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission would deal with the flood of work that would result from referring every such case?

Mr. Gregory: In cricket, there are certain rules and regulations which the two teams use when they go out to play. If my right hon. and learned Friend will bear with me, he will see that in this case we are playing with different rule books and are not comparing like with like. I can find no instances of such bids succeeding in Switzerland; that is partly because it is almost impossible for a United Kingdom bidder in Switzerland to have shares registered by the Swiss banking fraternity.

The Swiss have recognised their one-sidedness in this matter. To their embarrassment, they brought forward in February 1983—at about the time when we were looking at European merger policy—a Bill to restrict Swiss companies from blocking foreign shareholdings and hence foreign bids. That legislation is still lurking in the Swiss legislature. Why were these wider issues not considered by the Office of Fair Trading on the referral of the Nestlé bid for Rowntree?

I would be less than honest with the House if I did not address the question why the Labour party has tabled the motion. The Labour party has been diversive and unhelpful in this discussion, and I shall give two illustrations. The citizens of York have experienced the appalling effrontery of a Socialist Front-Bench spokesman coming to our city to urge Rowntree to throw in the towel. York needs no lectures from the Socialists. It was incredible that such a call should have been made, particularly when the work force were on holiday.

Furthermore, the Socialists in Europe chose to vote down a debate on Rowntree and instead discuss the subject of the middle east. That shows the polarity on this matter and shows that the Socialists are using the example of Rowntree, yet are not consistent in their arguments.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) rose——

Mr. Gregory: Let me move to another issue that should be addressed, that of small shareholders, many of whom have inherited shares or earned them as a result of their work for Rowntree. I received a letter from Edinburgh which said:

> "A takeover will have . . . substantial effects on a family which we do not want and are not in a position to take planned action within normal tax legislation following the sale of shares i.e. liabilities to capital gains and subsequent inheritance tax. These arise because the main contenders are Swiss and are unable due to Swiss legislation to offer voting shares to the value of their offers. The cash received by my father on compulsory sale will therefore be liable to capital gains assessment and as a result of his age the remainder of the family will suffer by the imposition of inheritance tax as the added sale value arising from the bid increase may just take his estate above the exempt limits.
> It therefore appears to the family that the Government has a vested interest in the success of a bid from the Swiss in raising substantial amounts of additional taxation from long term pensioner interests. On a rough calculation, in my father's case, a bid of £10 could be worth as little as £6 a share. The Government taking £4."

Those remarks were made with some concerned detail about an individual pensioner on behalf of his family.

Finally, now that Suchard has made a bid for Rowntree, will the Government recognise the wider implications and refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission? The breathing space would allow Britain to sort out its true mergers policy, its long-term considerations to the north of England as a site for manufacturing headquarters and its commitment to this country as the capital fount of major industry rather than to allow a major firm to become the satellite of a Swiss raider.

5.2 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory) has put his finger on a number of pertinent issues relating to the bids for Rowntree. He, I and many others still find it incomprehensible that no reference has been made to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission so that the issues can be examined.

It is worth referring to the Blue Paper that the Chancellor is so proud of because it helps us to develop an argument as to why a referral should have been made. Under the Fair Trading Act 1973, the enhancement of market share by a takeover and merger is a factor. The paper specifically states:

"Actual or proposed mergers (including partial shareholdings) qualify for consideration under the Act if they create or enhance a 25 per cent. market share or if the value of the assets taken over exceeds £30 million".

Rowntree currently has 26 per cent. of the United Kingdom confectionery market, so it seems that there is justification for referring any bid by any other confectionery company based in the United Kingdom, the European Community or elsewhere. The Nestlé or the Suchard bid would raise the share of the combined company to between 28 per cent. and 29 per cent. of the United Kingdom market.

The hon. Member for York was right to point out that that is the only area in which the Government have an established policy. They have been trying to block any development of a European-wide mergers policy, while at the same time using an expensive advertising campaign to tell businesses to be ready for 1992, but not listening to their own propaganda. Clearly the Government have no intention of preparing a policy for 1992. If Suchard were to take over Rowntree, its combined share of the EC market would be 24 per cent. A merger with Nestlé would produce a share of 20 per cent. Both would be over the agreed limit for referral under the European rules, which the Government have refused to support. That is an immediate sign that under rules currently being discussed within the European Community that bid would be referred, yet the Government have refused to do so.

The Secretary of State cannot hide behind the fact that the Office of Fair Trading has no grounds for referral—as he has tried to do—because the legislation makes it absolutely clear that:

"The decision whether or not to refer a qualifying merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation is the Secretary of State's."

He does not have to take the advice of the Office of Fair Trading.

In the Blue Paper the Government stated that those people who believe that other issues such as employment, regional issues, research and development, highly leveraged bids and foreign takeovers including reciprocity should be taken into account should be heeded. Nevertheless, they concluded;

"Normally, therefore, the decision should be left to the market."

Clearly, that is the line that the Government are taking, as the Chancellor of the Duchy has told us today. When the Secretary of State announced that there would be no referral, he said that the shareholders should be left to decide the issues raised.

That position represents an abject surrender to the stock market, and a refusal by the Government to accept responsibility in such affairs. Shareholders cannot be expected to decide whether the headquarters of a company in York is a critical factor, nor can they be expected to decide about employment practices or any other factors. They are certainly not interested in whether the bid will be in the consumers' interest. Their interest is how much money they will make on the deal, and that is all they can be expected to consider. The Government are refusing to accept their responsibility and have shown a failure to understand that their commitment to free enterprise is not valid unless they are also committed to ensuring that it is fair.

Mr. Leigh: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, with United Kingdom listed companies deriving some 45 per cent. of their profits from foreign operations, there is nothing for this country to gain by indulging in economic nationalism? If the answer to that is yes, how does the hon. Gentleman equate his comments with the traditional stance of the Liberal party on such matters?

Mr. Bruce: I believe that an open market is a desirable proposition that should be encouraged, but it is important that the same criteria apply to all the players in the market. The hon. Member for York made that point quite effectively. The argument that I shall develop is that equal opportunity to participate on the same basis is not available.

The next issue that must be tested is what motivates a takeover in the first place. The DTI's own paper shows that the motivation is very often that of unsuccessful large companies seeking to take over their irritatingly successful competitors, which are often smaller and more vulnerable. Submissions from Rowntree prove that point, as its brand shares are increasing and Nestlé's brand shares are declining dramatically within the United Kingdom market. There is plenty of evidence. Research carried out by the DTI reveals that, even in terms of improved profitability after merger, the general performance was poor. It makes the final point that that is "a weak test of efficiency gains because mergers may produce higher profits through the exploitation of increased market power."

In other words, very often the attempt to secure a degree of monopoly is the prime motivation for mergers, and that is why a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is normally desirable for mergers on such a scale.

The DTI paper acknowledges one factor that is highly relevant in this case—the issue of reciprocity. The paper says:

"One consideration that may be relevant in some cases is the extent to which United Kingdom companies have reciprocal freedom to acquire companies based in the home country of the prospective acquirer."

The Chancellor of the Duchy and the Secretary of State have chosen to dismiss that argument as not proven and not even worth investigating. The Government stand indicted in that respect.

There is no doubt that Swiss companies are not open to hostile takeovers as are United Kingdom companies. The Chancellor of the Duchy acknowledged that the practice is different because the structure of the two economies is fundamentally different. Switzerland is outside the EC. It does not contribute to the EC, but it is anxious to participate in our single market after 1992. It operates a system that makes it extremely difficult for us to take a stake in its economy.

I shall quote somebody who may have more authority with the right hon. and learned Gentleman—Lord Plumb, the President of the European Parliament. He said:

"I met the chairman of Rowntree plc and I was most concerned by what he had to say. Trans-national mergers will become much more common in the next few years, a fact well recognised by Rowntree's directors, but it must be remembered that Switzerland is not part of the EC and does not itself entertain hostile bids from abroad for its companies."

It appears that the Government are at odds with Lord Plumb on this issue.

The House should dwell on the simple fact that Switzerland is essentially a banking economy. Manufacturing is not its life blood. It invests in overseas companies and uses the banking community. [HON. MEMBERS: "Provide evidence."] It is in the interests of the

[Mr. Bruce]

Swiss, having made such investments, to ensure that they are protected. That is why they restrict the voting rights on shares—it makes sense for them.

Because the Swiss attract so much in deposits from overseas, they have access to investment funding which is not so readily available to British or EC-based companies that must ensure that they have shares with which to raise money on the stock market. The two economies therefore follow divergent paths.

There may not be conclusive proof, but there is sufficient evidence to warrant closer investigation into the extent to which the partnership is equal. This affair, and one or two other recent ones, such as the merger of British Airways and British Caledonian, which was badly mishandled by the Government and disgracefully handled by the MMC, suggest that it is time that rather more thought was given to what criteria should be applied when takeovers are proposed.

The Department of Trade and Industry's evidence shows that the motivation for merger is often the desire to acquire insulation from competition, not the desire to exploit it. The criteria for a reference to the MMC should therefore be changed so that, when there is a hostile bid, the onus is on the bidder to prove that the merger is in the consumers' interest. At the moment, the company being bid for has to prove that the merger is anti-competitive. That is always much harder to prove.

The Chancellor of the Duchy dismissed regional considerations in a cavalier fashion, but they are important in United Kingdom and EC terms. The right hon. and learned Gentleman could at the very least acknowledge that, after referral, even if the bid goes ahead, it must do so on the basis of assurances about Rowntree retaining its corporate headquarters in York and substantial financial autonomy.

I find it extraordinary that, in this modern and diversified age, the Government still insist that the shareholder is sovereign. When a company of this size is involved, the work force should be taken into account. I have consistently argued that workers are entitled to be consulted on strategic considerations. If a company that wants to take them over cannot persuade them that there is an attractive and positive future, that should be taken into account.

The fact that the Swiss are making the bids and that they are outside the EC is relevant. It is not right that they should be able to sit behind the barricades and pick ripe cherries. By failing even to refer the matter so that it can be evaluated properly, the Government are advertising to the world the fact that there are ripe and juicy pickings in Britain just waiting to be plucked.

An open market brings benefits, but it is vital that stall holders and customers know that there are rules of fair competition and that they will be enforced effectively. Reciprocity must be comparable. The onus should be on the predator to prove that there is an advantage to the consumer from merger, and regional considerations and the rights of the work force should be taken into account. I am not saying that any one of those issues should block a bid, but they should be taken into account. The fact that the Government have brushed them all aside and are letting shareholders, the market, the City and institutions decide shows that they are unaware of their responsible role, which is to ensure that the market operates freely, fairly, honestly and openly.

5.15 pm

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): I hope that hon. Members will not challenge my free market credentials. I do not want to waste the time of the House going through them, as this is a short debate.

We have to consider some of the wider issues and the paradox of how to regulate a market to ensure that, while it is not a total free-for-all, it is relatively free and fair. All Conservative Members believe ultimately in the free market, but we recognise that there has occasionally to be regulation, even when we are deregulating when regulation is unnecessary. It is a difficult hurdle, but we must cross it.

Few hon. Members would say that there should be a free-for-all and absolutely no regulation in competition policy. I hope, however, that we all agree that there should be a minimum of regulation to establish as fair a market as possible. That must apply to Britain and to the EC.

The debate is not about challenging international investment, which is clearly good for countries in the free enterprise system. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy said, Britain has benefited enormously, is still benefiting and will continue to benefit from investments we have made in countries such as the United States and in Europe.

I hope that we are not challenging whether there should be foreign investment here. It is obvious that we have benefited from jobs and wealth creation which are the result of overseas firms investing here. Our firms have gone into Europe and created wealth and jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) has understandably put up an honourable defence of an important company in his constituency. Few hon. Members who try to look after what they perceive to be the interests of their constituents would criticise him for that. Nevertheless, I must say with the greatest possible respect that, bearing in mind the wider interests, the issue of Rowntree is not really about regional policy or even about creating jobs, because one can make a strong case, on the basis of Nestlé's record, suggesting that jobs in York will not be damaged.

My right hon. and learned Friend said that ultimately the issue was competition. It is the duty of a Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to consider the effect of any proposed merger on competition in a market. That must be the balance of his judgment. On the facts presented to him, it probably was not possible to make a sound case for referring the merger of Nestlé and Rowntree, as it had such a minimal effect on the increased concentration of the confectionery market in Britain.

We should be thinking about how we deal with concentration in the EC market, consistent with wanting, encouraging and believing in foreign investment. The United States has an anti-trust policy. Many of our companies wishing to invest in the United States have had to get round it. Many have failed because, under the anti-trust legislation, the Americans have said no to British or foreign investment that was against the interests of competition policy.

The Japanese have no tradition of company takeovers. There have been few examples of overseas firms buying into Japan, but no doubt that will happen in the future and Japan will have to consider its competition policy. The third industrial bloc in the world, the EC, will, as we approach the magic date of 1992, have to think about concentration in each of its market sectors. We cannot buck that issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) has mentioned 1992 and the fact that we are now in the Common Market. We must try to ensure that each market sector is not so dominated by giants that it becomes difficult for new entrants to keep the market sector alive.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): I realise that the mere mention of 1992 elicits knowing nods from everyone, but I do not see what it has to do with the Rowntree takeover. Surely the European confectionery market has been liberal and relatively free for some time. One does not have to acquire an EC confectionery company to gain access to EC markets.

Mr. Grylls: I do not necessarily disagree with my hon. Friend. I was trying to broaden the debate—the terms of the motion are fairly broad—into competition policy of the EC as a whole and what we must do in each market sector.

The confectionery sector in the EC is already fairly concentrated. Six major firms—three from Great Britain and three from the continent—control 70 per cent. of the confectionery market. I am not saying whether that is right or wrong, but there is room for judgment whether six companies controlling 70 per cent. of the market is excessive concentration. We shall have to think about that matter in future, as mergers take place. If the Rowntree merger takes place, there will be not six but five firms controlling 70 per cent. of the market. We must ask, should that be allowed?

Ministers will have to consider a merger directive when they attend a meeting of the Council of Ministers on 22 June. I detect—I congratulate the Government on this—a movement from the rather negative attitude that earlier British Governments, including this one in their early years of office, took to the merger directive. They said, "We want to run it our way and do not want anything to do with a European directive." That change of attitude is welcome and sensible.

The Economic and Social Committee of the European Community has given its opinion of the latest edition of the merger directive that has been laid by Mr. Peter Sutherland. I shall quote from it because it clearly spells out what we must consider if we are to maximise competition and achieve success in the market. The opinion of the Economic and Social Committee says:

"In the Community itself the interdependence of economies which has developed makes it necessary at least to consider the European dimension of markets in assessing planned concentrations. In its Opinion on the Commission's 15th Report on Competition Policy the Committee stated that 'The continued existence of national economic areas is an anachronism when it comes to achieving a sufficient degree of real competitiveness'. The Committee continued: 'The smallest possible geographical yardstick is now the Community, and even then the world dimension cannot be disregarded.'"

I passionately believe that there must be maximum competition in the different sectors of the EC in which our businesses operate. Indeed, it is vital to the success of the European Community as a market that that should happen. We should not allow over-concentration in any market sector.

If I might be so bold as to leave my right hon. and learned Friend with a message, it is that we must consider this matter in a European way. We must consider each market sector and avoid excessive concentration. If not, it will militate directly against the successful work that the Government, above all, have done in encouraging the creation of new businesses and jobs. If the market is over-concentrated, new businesses will not start up. That is not only my view but that of most people in the European Community.

The economies that have been most successful in the past, such as Germany and France, have been conscious of avoiding over-concentration. Germany, partly because of her history, took a strong view after the war that she did not want concentration of her industry. Since the war, Britain has seemed to go the other way. We have allowed growth by acquisition rather than organic internal growth in our companies. I hope that that will change, but we must watch it and consider every market sector.

If economic progress is anything, it is surely the process of selection from alternatives. We must ensure that there are sufficient alternatives in each market for the public to have a choice. I hope that, when our Ministers attend the Council of Ministers' meeting on 22 June, they will have an open and constructive mind and try to agree a merger directive. It is no good going to the meeting half-heartedly and saying, "We want what we have always had in this country." That will not do. We must look anew at the Community as a market and ask how we can maximise competition. If Ministers do that, we shall achieve the right directive and strengthen the European Community business market for the good of future generations.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the debate. I have a strong constituency, union and, I confess, consumer interest in this matter.

Other Labour Members have referred to reciprocity and competition, so I shall not say anything further about them. I should like to discuss employment. When we initially debated this issue on 25 May, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said there were no employment grounds that justified a reference in this case. He has repeated that today. It is disingenuous of the Chancellor to argue that case because, in answer to the private notice question on 25 May, he said that open markets were best. I put it to the Chancellor—I think that some of his colleagues have already started to put it to him—that the real position of the Government is that they believe that there are no employment grounds in any case that would justify a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman believed that the implications for employment were a legitimate reason for a reference, he would recognise that there are 13,000 jobs at risk in the industry, mainly in the north of England. There are 1,000 people in my constituency, managers and workers alike, who believe that the takeover bid by Suchard or Nestlé would put their jobs at risk. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would also recognise that all those people have been left out in the cold.

[Mr. Doug Henderson]

I can clarify the latest union position. The main union, the General and Municipal Boilermakers and Allied Trades Union, and the union in Halifax, the Transport and General Workers Union, take the same view. They want Rowntree to run its existing production plants in the United Kingdom. They feel that they have been sold down the river by the Government. They have an obligation as a trade union negotiating committee to continue to discuss and negotiate with every potential buyer of the company. That has not changed in the past week, and it has been the union position throughout. All the potential bidders have been asked whether they can guarantee the jobs and a headquarters in the north of England. Those bidders have not been able to give such a guarantee.

I hope that the Chancellor will recognise the importance of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. He said that there is no need to refer the issue, because the decision of the commission would be to endorse a possible takeover. He should put that to the test. All the workers in the industry want that to be put to the test.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Henderson: I cannot give way to my hon. Friends, because I do not intend to give way to Conservative Members. I must be fair.

Surely the workers have a right to put their case. Is it not their efforts, skill and expertise that have made Rowntree plc a strong company, with strong products, high productivity and improving profitability? It has doubled the profits in Europe in the past year and is now a sitting duck for all foreign predators. Workpeople in manufacturing companies up and down the country must be wondering whether it is their turn next. We need new legislation to give workpeople a say.

Clearly the threat to competition from increasing monopoly does not count with the Secretary of State. The same is clearly true in relation to the asset value, mentioned by the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). Where either of those conditions are met, in relation to the proportion of market share or in relation to asset value, the workers should have additional rights. Workpeople should be able to initiate a ballot among themselves to decide whether they should have a chance to have their case heard by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. If it is good enough for workpeople to be compelled to have a ballot when industrial action is contemplated, it is good enough for workpeople to have a ballot when capital action is threatened, as in this case.

I want to make it clear that I am not arguing a syndicalist case. It is not a question of the workers having a right to determine what happens ultimately, but their case should be heard.

There is no doubt that the Government have misjudged public feeling. The workpeople are against the takeover. The president of the Confederation of British Industry, Mr. Banham, has stated publicly that he believes that there is a need for an investigation so that all parties can put their case. Consumers, in their correspondence to local newspapers up and down the country, are clearly in favour of a reference so that the arguments about competition may be heard. Also, 60 Conservative Members have signed an early-day motion saying that they believe that there is a need to have all the arguments out in the open.

I urge the Government to bury their dogma, recognise the depth of opposition to what they are doing and give all parties a chance to put their case to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

5.35 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I listened with care to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) when he opened the debate. Unfortunately, he has just nipped out for a Kit Kat but I am sure that as soon as he sees my name on the screen he will be back. He had quite a nerve to castigate the Government for a lack of clarity in their competition policy. We had no guidance from him as to what criteria the Labour party, if in government, would employ in deciding whether to refer a case to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. We know that the hon. Member for Dagenham is the architect of the perestroika within the Labour party at present and the only certainty about its policy is that what was policy yesterday is not necessarily policy today and what is policy today may not be policy tomorrow.

The hon. Gentleman is desperate to create a voter-friendly Labour party to bring it back into government. We know that there is a sort of Boston tea party of dogmas being ditched overboard. Before the previous election the Labour party had to accept that it would still have to support the sale of council houses. There were certain trade union reforms that it could not repeal and it had to accept that nationalisation was a dead letter. I believe that it has now announced that our tax cuts will not be substantially reversed and that its unilateral policy has been dumped. Also, in spite of the hon. Member for Dagenham's remarks about British sovereignty being lost, the Labour party has now been forced to accept that we will remain within the EEC. Who knows? It may come to believe in a free movement of capital and inward investment, like the Labour party in New Zealand.

The hon. Member for Dagenham is in a slightly delicate position. He based his speech on the complaint of foreigners coming to Britain to take over cherished national institutions. It so happens that the hon. Gentleman was born far from these shores and I believe that he may have some designs on taking over the Labour party. He certainly wants to try to improve its performance and make its product more saleable. The list of changes in policy that I have just given shows the benefit of the hon. Gentleman to the Labour party in the intellectual free flow of capital. That is exactly the sort of argument we are employing in relation to this bid and the policy in regard to takeovers by foreign companies. I doubt whether the hon. Member for Dagenham could make the Labour party as palatable to the British electorate as Rowntree's products are to me.

I wholly endorse the decision of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor not to refer the proposed takeover to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That decision is a welcome stand against arbitrary political interference in industry for chauvinistic reasons. I welcome the emphasis on competition that has now succeeded in our merger policy. It is certainly a great change from the disasters we have seen in the past. It is not long ago that Labour Members were doing everything they could to encourage mergers and industrial reorganisation, co-operation and so on during the 1960s. Big was certainly better in those days. We learned something from our disastrous experience then. It is equally wrong for the Labour party to take the dogmatic view that it now takes.

The Government have been quite correct to listen to the Director General of Fair Trading, Sir Gordon Borrie, who is certainly not one of our friends in the City or a political confederate of this Government. Indeed, Sir Gordon Borrie is on record as saying that he doubts the value of mergers in the first place because they do not "necessarily bring about the most efficient deployment of and development of the assets which . . . shares represent."

In spite of Sir Gordon's political views, which may be different from ours for all I know, and in spite of his doubts, he has not seen fit to advise the Secretary of State to refer the proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

As has been announced, there are no competition grounds for referring the bid. The hon. Member for Dagenham was quite wrong to say that Nestlé sought to eliminate a powerful rival in confectionery. The figures belie that assertion. Cadbury has 30 per cent. of the market, Rowntree 26 per cent., Nestlé only 3 per cent. and Suchard only 2 per cent. How can Nestlé's 3 per cent. constitute a powerful threat to Rowntree or vice versa? Of the 40 leading brands of chocolate and confectionery, Rowntree has 11 and Nestlé and Suchard have only one each. Given those figures, how can the powerful rivalry referred to by the hon. Member for Dagenham arise?

The truth is that Nestlé is a broadly based food product company whereas Rowntree is principally a confectionery company. Those two elements—to some extent contrasting elements—fit neatly together. I express no views on the likelihood of the merger taking place or as to whether it would be good or bad for the shareholders or employees of the company because I do not know enough about it. I would merely say that the Nestlé company has been in this country for about 120 years and operates with considerable responsibility. It employs 10,000 people in this country—some of them, I believe, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who is sitting on the Opposition Front Bench.

Let us consider the regional argument. I understand that Nestlé has just over 4,000 employees in the south, nearly 4,000 in the north and more than 1,000 in Scotland, so the majority of Nestlé's employees are not in the south but in the north. Why should we fear for jobs if Nestlé is successful in its takeover bid? As an hon. Member representing a constituency in the north-west, I have no fear of multinational companies. Thousands of new jobs have been created in the north-west—in the county of Cheshire in particular—with Marks and Spencer, Shell and Barclays bank all coming to our part of the world because they know that the quality of life is better and that one can have a higher standard of living because one does not have to spend so much on property.

The brands that Nestlé sells in this country are well known to everyone, although people may not know that Nestlé owns them. Findus, Crosse and Blackwell, Sarson's, Libby's and Carnation are all well-known brands. On the basis of Nestlé's experience in this country, there is no reason to believe that if it succeeded in taking over Rowntree it would close down operations or move factories and products elsewhere. Being one of the most advanced and successful capitalist economies in the world, Switzerland has very little unemployment. Therefore, I fail to see how one can argue that jobs would move to Switzerland; there are no unemployed people to take on the new jobs. I hope that in due course we shall overtake Switzerland as one of the most advanced capitalist economies in the world.

If hon. Members had to choose a drinking water to consume, would they choose Perrier or Ashbourne? If one took the chauvinist view of Opposition Members, one would choose Perrier because Perrier is owned by a British company. One would not choose Ashbourne water because, with due respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim), it is owned by a foreign company, Nestlé. That shows the absurdity of Labour Members' chauvinist arguments.

As for the argument about reciprocity, we know very well that Ministers in Switzerland do not have the powers that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has to block mergers and prevent takeovers. It is true, as a matter of practicality, that companies in Switzerland by and large protect themselves against hostile takeover bids. Most European countries erect barriers against hostile and unwelcome takeover bids. I believe that the Leader of the Opposition is erecting barriers against unwelcome and hostile takeover bids at the moment. I believe that shortly one will have to have 25 per cent. of the voting shares in the Labour party in this House before one can have the temerity to stand in an election for the leadership. That shows the hypocrisy of Labour Members.

Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones (Vice-Chancellor of Her Majesty's Household): He is foreign.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) points out that the Leader of the Opposition is foreign but, as we are all three Welshmen, we all suffer from that disability.

Takeovers and the threat of takeovers are a vital part of the competitive process and can be a significant part of the engine of growth of a capitalist economy. We have been seduced by the arguments that came out of the Cambridge school of economics in the 1930s about perfect competition and the static equilibrium analysis. We have been led up a blind alley by that. Markets are a dynamic discovery process, as Professor Hayek and the Austrian school have pointed out. If monopoly profits exist, they are essentially temporary because if there are no legal barriers to entry into the market there is a stimulus to imitation and improvement. The threat of takeover, even if it is not realised, is another discipline leading to efficiency. Nearly all companies, regardless of their size, are susceptible to takeover bids, except perhaps the big oil companies or companies of the size of British Telecom. With reverse takeovers, even the large companies are no longer immune to the threat of being taken over.

I know that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) speaks with some feeling about mergers and brings to the House a special and rather painful experience. In his experience, not all mergers are successful; they do not all live up to the prospects held out for them. I do not dissent from that. The hon. Member for Dagenham devoted considerable time to that point in his speech. He observed that not all takeovers increase efficiency and drew attention to a number of academic analyses to prove it. But that is not the point. Most important are the unobservable and immeasurable gains that come from the threat of takeover as a spur to efficiency—the submerged iceberg of generalised efficiency gains in companies kept up to the mark by the existence of takeover bids.

In conclusion, I make three brief points. First, in competition policy generally, we should move away—I say this with respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls)—from the rather crude indicator of size of market and size of company towards a system that reflects the European practice of cracking down on an abuse of a dominant position rather than simply objecting to that dominant position. The use made of power rather than the nature of the power itself is the essential element on which we should concentrate.

Secondly, I believe that the Government in general are incompetent to devise—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Labour Members had considerable experience of incompetent Governments when they were in office. Things have changed somewhat since. We recognise our limitations and, as Labour Members know, we are trying, so far as possible, to abolish government.

The Government are incompetent to devise a correct market structure for successful business. Markets are not perfect but they are less imperfect as controlling forces than government. Markets correct more reliably the imperfections in the economy. There is no evidence of which I am aware that the Office of Fair Trading, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission or the Government generally have made better decisions than would have been made if matters had been left to the market. We have had a huge collection of changing criteria underlying monopoly policy over the years. One minute the criterion is competition, the next it is reciprocity, then it is a regional consideration. Sometimes the criterion has to do with the person taking over. I object to people like Robert Maxwell, who is not averse to setting up barriers to taking over his company, which is based not even in Switzerland but in Liechtenstein. I do not hear much criticism of that from Labour Members.

My third and last point—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am listening to myself and I like what I hear, which is more than I can say when Opposition Members are on their feet. Notwithstanding the general point about the value of the threat of a takeover, companies should be allowed to defend themselves against takeover if the shareholders are willing to pay the price—something that happens in Switzerland. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West made a good point about that the other day when my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Trade and Industry made his statement.

There can be a problem when a short-term drop in profits results from investment in research and development and in improving organisation and efficiency, the rewards of which may not be felt until some future time. At that stage, it is possible for a predatory takeover and the rewards of effort and entrepreneurship may not fall to those who deserve them. All manner of exotic devices have been invented to avoid that—golden parachutes, shark repellent, pacmac defences, greenmail and so on. I do not have time to explain that, but shall leave it to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) who is more of a details man than I am.

Companies are restricted by the takeover code during the bid period. The inhibitions upon the takeover mechanisms have some cost to society and to the economy in general, although that is justifiable. Contracts providing for substantial delayed compensation for managers are very much the vogue, which has been hugely to the advantage of Britain. People such as Sir Ralph Halpern can earn enormous amounts of money on the back of creating vast amounts of wealth to be generally distributed throughout the country. Indeed, I see a large number of Burton suits on Opposition Members. It would be wrong for such rewards to be seized by predators. If shareholders are willing to pay the price, we must ensure that uncertainty does not reduce the incentives.

The Government have made a correct decision. The concentration on competition is the essence of the case and the Government are absolutely right to reject the hysteria, chauvinism and xenophobia of the Opposition's economic criticisms.

5.52 pm

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): I shall not attempt to follow the speech of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), who was extremely selfish in the amount of time that he took.

I wish to declare a few interests because each of them is an aspect of the Rowntree case. I am a trade union-sponsored Member of APEX. All the staff of Rowntree and Cadbury Schweppes are members of that union, of which I was president for 12 years. Continuing consequences of great importance for Cadbury Schweppes arise from the debate that we are supposed to be having about Rowntree, but to which few hon. Members have addressed themselves. I am president of the European Movement and chairman of the Labour Movement for Europe. Serious criticisms of the Government can be made from that standpoint, although many of my hon. Friends will not share my enthusiasm for the European cause.

The Minister's speech was one of the most disappointing that I have heard for a long time. I can best describe it as a speech with a hole in the middle—the hole in the middle where we should have heard all the considerations that we expected him to deal with, but which he singularly failed to address. Other than financial considerations, he had nothing to say about the interests of the work force, the consumers or the national interest generally. He actually had the impertinence to say that the Labour party was taking the country back into the last century and, by implication, that the Government were concerned with the wider interests. In fact, the opposite is true.

A century ago, all that mattered in industry was the ability to make a profit, and everything was judged by that criterion. Over the intervening 100 years, Parliament has had to decide, in almost every conceivable way, that the interests of the work force should be protected by legislation and that it would be fundamentally wrong to allow the interests of the shareholders unrestricted dominance over the interests of the work force. Many of those who have held office in the trade union movement tried to achieve a partnership between the interests of capital and the interests of the work force. Those who invest their working lives in industry are as important as those who invest their capital.

The Prime Minister, on one of her high moral days, tried to tell us that the ability to create wealth was most important. Wealth is created by the work force applying themselves to the tasks that they are employed to carry out. I do not object to the Prime Minister's comments, because I know that it is the working people who create the wealth, and they have done so for as long as most of us can remember.

The protective legislation that I mentioned must be examined during any takeover bid. Section 309(1) of the Companies Act 1985 states:

"The matters to which the directors of a company are to have regard in the performance of their functions include the interests of the company's employees in general, as well as the interests of its members."

The Government appear to be saying that during no part of the takeover process should someone have to prove that he intends to abide by the legislation of the land. The Terms and Conditions of Employment Regulations 1981 make it clear, especially in regulation 10, that there is a clear duty to protect the interests of working people during a transfer or takeover. I am not suggesting that Nestlé or any other company will not do that, but it must show that it intends to do so before any takeover is allowed.

I accept that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission might not be the appropriate body to examine the takeover —that is certainly the Government's case. However, they cannot simply say that the considerations of the work force and the consumers cannot be examined by the MMC and will not be the subject of any statement or consideration by the Government. Their attitude is that the only criterion to be considered is the sale or the transfer of shares. I understand that, on the continent, takeovers do not arise from the transfer or sale of shares—the purchase of the company is the essence of continental legislation. That is much more sensible than the Government's policy. It recognises wider issues than simply the sale of shares. As the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) said, competition policy is important and we should know what is happening.

Speaking as a long-committed European, I have some prejudice against Switzerland or any other country outside the EC trying to obtain the best of both worlds. They are trying to have it both ways, which is fundamentally wrong and something to which I object. It is the Government's dury to address that question.

I know all about 1992, and I share the Government's view of getting ourselves geared up for the single market. However, I am totally opposed to gearing ourselves up to compete in Europe in 1992 by allowing countries which will not accept the obligation of EC membership all the advantages of membership from a trading point of view. Yet that is the very situation which the Government appear to be allowing in this instance.

Many other Governments would not allow such a thing to happen. This morning, I was told by Mr. Dominic Cadbury, chief executive of Cadbury Schweppes, that when his company recently bought a firm in France, Cadbury was subjected to considerable questioning as to whether it would, as a British company, remain in membership of the EC. The French were concerned about the hostile bid to which Cadbury had been subjected succeeding, the point being that if the control of Cadbury Schweppes were to move from this country, as a member of the EC, to the United States, the French Government would have intervened in order to protect European interests. That is something our Government have not even considered, and of which they do not take great account. The Minister's statement on the question of reciprocity was almost irresponsible, so far as British interests are concerned.

It is essential that the takeover be referred to someone, to examine the situation in this country in respect of mergers, monopolies, and hostile bids within the scope of expanding European policies, 1992, and world competition policy; as we know, the world is, from a business point of view, shrinking all the time.

The Minister has said nothing about Rowntree. It is entitled to an explanation. Rowntree is a special kind of company. Over the years, it has given over much of its profit to the social benefit of the local community. Will that practice be continued? Are the Government saying that they will not consider even that aspect? If so, it is incredible and disgraceful.

I refer also to Cadbury. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) has, as is often the case, made common cause with hon. Members for Birmingham constituencies on this side of the House, in the interests of that city. The money from the Bourneville Trust, as with Rowntree, has been controlled by people who have looked beyond their own self-interest to the local community and to society as a whole. That is a major factor and one that ought to be exercising our minds. However, it has not been mentioned once by the Minister today. Apparently, he does not consider it to be of any importance how Rowntree's profits are distributed and what relationship it has with the local community and the wider world.

The chairman of Cadbury Schweppes has told me, as he has no doubt told other hon. Members, that if the Government permit Nestlé's takeover of Rowntree, Cadbury will then be the only major confectionery company remaining open to acquisition by anybody. All the others are under private control or enjoy protection by virtue of the legislation in their own countries. Britain, which provides no such protection, risks losing the ownership of almost its entire chocolate confectionery industry and the No. 1 soft drinks company in the United Kingdom, which is the No. 3 company worldwide. No other Government would allow such a sacrifice without an investigation, without some reference being made, and without the predator being asked to give guarantees. The Government are behaving in a blatantly irresponsible and disgraceful manner.

The Government are in this instance operating a something-for-nothing policy. When it comes to defence matters, the Government say that we should never give up anything unless we can be sure of getting something in exchange. However, when it comes to industry takeovers, the Government are standing their own philosophy and policy on their heads.

The Minister claimed that the Labour party is making a political football out of this matter. I am against that happening, but if the Government refuse to offer any protection to the legitimate interests of British industry, the Labour party will not only be right but will have a bounden duty to make that a political issue in the next general election in 1990 or 1991. It will go to the country with the issues of poll tax, the National Health Service and social security, and will also say, "Vote Conservative and you will lose all your protection and your basic industries." When the Prime Minister visited Cadbury Schweppes in the course of the last election to see what was happening there and to win votes, she did not say then to the work force, "If there is an offer for this company, I will allow it to go ahead without protecting your legitimate interests." If the Government do not come to their senses, it will be the duty of the Labour party to raise the issue nationwide at the next general election.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I confess to mixed feelings in approaching this debate. I am glad that the House is again being given an opportunity to consider the future of Rowntree. The House may recall that I initiated an Adjournment debate on this matter shortly before the House rose for the Whitsun recess. In the event, it did not begin until about 5.30 in the morning. I am pleased that on this occasion we are debating the matter at a more sociable hour, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs endorses that remark.

I have mixed feelings because of my deep distrust of the motives of the Labour party in bringing this issue before the House today. It is noticeable that, since my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced that he did not intend to refer the Rowntree bid .to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, what had been a matter of all-party consensus developed into a major party political argument. This debate is not about Rowntree and its future but gives an opportunity to the Opposition to attack the Government—[Interruption.] I have listened to this debate from the start and it has provided plenty of evidence to support that remark.

We have also seen Labour party heavyweights coming into the York area to make their views known.

Mr. Denis Howell: Who are they?

Mr. Greenway: I shall mention their names in a moment.

At first glance, the motion expresses many of the points which Government Members have made. But we all know, and the comments that we have heard today prove conclusively, that that is not what the Labour party really believes. Behind that is a much more sinister motive, and comments made in York over the past week confirm it.

First, the shadow Leader of the House, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), came to York to complain of institutions making use of northerners' savings. I was not sure from the comments reported in the paper what the hon. Gentleman meant, but the implication is clear: it suggests the direction of investment strategy that any future Labour Government would put in place. When the hon. Gentleman talks about northerners' savings and complains about institutions, he forgets that many institutional firms in Great Britain are managed from the north and from Scotland.

Then the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) came to York, and talked about proof of a public-interest requirement for mergers and a social ownership policy. That underlies what any future Labour Government would do, and there is no doubt that it would be damaging and unhelpful to our economy. I regret to say that the Labour party has attacked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for her attitude to the north. Such attacks are disgraceful and entirely unjustified, given my right hon. Friend's concern and her commitment to inner-city action and, particularly in the north—not far from my constituency—the personal interest that she has taken in the Teesside development corporation.

The motion talks of adopting policies, but what policies would Labour advocate? It is significant that the motion fails to address the most important aspect, to which hon. Members have referred in the debate—the future of the draft European Community directive. Labour Members now say, thanks to some persuasion by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), that they need to be European—but they do not think European. Their policies would have obstructed Rowntree in the European investment that it has already made. The hon. Member for Dagenham, I believe, referred to the factory in Hamburg purchased by Rowntree. There is no doubt that Rowntree, as a multinational company, is much fitter and better able to compete in the world because of its investments overseas.

I cannot escape the conclusion that the Rowntree issue will spur member states to ratify the European Commission directive with far more urgency than they might have if the issue had not come before us in the past six weeks. We debated reciprocity in my Adjournment debate. Before I forget, I must say to my right hon. and learned Friend that I do not feel that the answers that he has given today entirely address the problem. Leaving that aside, however, I believe that the European Commission directive is the real reason why the bid should have been referred. I cannot but feel that because of what has happened there will be a ratification, and a policy from which companies such as Rowntree may be able to benefit, in the not-too-distant future. In my view, the Government could have been a little more devious in helping to protect Rowntree's interests.

It is debatable whether at this late stage Rowntree's future as an independent company can be saved, and whether there may be a political solution. My hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Gregory) referred to the initiatives of our friend the Member of the European Parliament for York, Mr. Edward McMillan Scott, to persuade the French and German Governments to consider the implications of the Nestlé and Suchard bids for Rowntree. I feel, however, that it would be far better if in the time left tonight we looked at the future and tried to address some of the lessons that Parliament, we as politicians and the community at large may be able to learn from what has happened.

The main reason why I object so strongly to what Labour Members have said today is their attempt to apportion all the blame for Rowntree's position to the Government.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): It is true.

Mr. Greenway: If the hon. Gentleman will listen, he will realise that it is patently obvious that that is not the case. I believe that both the management of the company and the institutions must share some of the responsibility. Suchard first made approaches to Rowntree some four years ago, at the time of the publication of the Nestlé offer document. It was made clear at the press conference that Suchard had approached Rowntree a year ago, and the company did not appear to respond to those approaches.

A certain feeling is emerging among the work force in the constituency of York and in my constituency. While I have responsibility for a large rural part of north Yorkshire, part of the Rowntree factory complex is in my constituency, along with many hundreds, if not thousands, of the work force. I feel that the company could have been more ready to respond to the bids that have been made. I am slightly mystified about why the defence from Rowntree was not published as soon as possible after the publication of the Nestlé offer document, rather than Rowntree's waiting to see whether the bid was referred.

As for the institutions, I think that they could have had much more discussion with the management about how they saw the company's future. This is a slightly offensive point, but we have heard some implied criticism of the stand that we have taken, as though this were just a little local difficulty. That is not the case: it is an important national issue. It highlights the fear that some of our better businesses will fall to predators outside the European Community. As local politicians we certainly should not interfere, but recognising what has happened to Rowntree we should perhaps take more of an interest.

As I have said, I feel that the Government could have been more devious. They could have helped Rowntree by referring the bid and giving a spur to the debate which must come in the next two weeks, on 22 June, to ratify the European Commission directive. The people of York feel that the Government have let them down, and I must respect that view by abstaining in the vote tonight.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I agree with many of the points that have been made by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Gregory). The Government should have given serious consideration to the possible spin-off of job losses as a result of this takeover bid. They have the power to do so, regardless of Sir Gordon Borrie's recommendations. It is obvious that the Government are not giving sufficient protection to British industry, especially when the companies concerned are based in the north. In my area, Rowntree is a well-respected company, where the work force is happy and proud to work. Six hundred and fifty employees are based in the Castleford area, where during the past four or five years the Government have deliberately run down the job opportunities. Recently in a meeting in this place, the chairman of Nestlé could give no guarantee whatsoever that there would be no job losses arising out of this takeover.

Mr. Vaz: My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) has mentioned the possibility of job losses in the north. I hope that he will note that there is a Rowntree factory in Leicester. It is a Fox's Glacier Mint factory. When I visited the factory last week, there was widespread anxiety shown by the work force, especially as this is the third takeover that it has been subjected to in the past 10 years. Will he agree that nothing that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has said will reassure those workers in Leicester about potential job losses?

Mr. Lofthouse: I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). We can expect job losses if we take into account the track record of previous takeover bids. However, I sincerely hope that my interpretation is wrong.

I feel that the Government should have had the bid investigated. There is more to it than strict rigid guidelines for the Secretary of State and, indeed, Sir Gordon Borrie. If they are so rigidly bound to the guidelines, I suggest that the law needs changing. I would hope that any Government—where there is a threat to jobs at major British companies and takeover bids resulting in British companies being controlled by foreign companies—would always be keen to conduct a thorough investigation of the social and job loss consequences.

I am not surprised at the treatment that many parts of the north have received. I disagree with the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) who said that the Government had not disregarded many areas of the north. If the hon. Gentleman lived in my area where the Rowntree factory is situated, he would have a different opinion.

I am sorry that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has left, because I have some messages for him. In four years, 10,000 jobs have been lost arising out of direct Government action. His own Department has not done one stroke to encourage further industry in that area. I am now talking about the small area that includes the town of Castleford.

After persistent pressure, meetings with Ministers, speeches in the House and correspondence, we have still not convinced the Minister that there should be some assistance for the north. Many of my constituents who work at the Rowntree factory are the wives of the miners who have been thrown out of work, and will probably never work again. Do Conservative Members not think that there is anxiety in the area? Do Conservative Members not think that the bid should have been investigated thoroughly to ascertain what might be the social consequences? I think that any really responsible Government would have wanted that.

It appears to me that all that the Government want to do is continue their policy of sending our companies abroad at the expense of the British workers. When I visited the Rowntree factory the workers were 100 per cent. against this takeover bid. They do not want to be working for some faceless people in Europe. They trust and respect the people that they work for now. Have we no pride left? Should not the Government assist locally and nationally established companies with a major success record like Rowntree? I hope that any Government would do so. I believe that the Government have an obligation to refer this takeover bid even at this late stage. I hope that they will.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): One of the matters that has most concerned me about his whole issue is the way in which many fears have been generated in towns like York and Halifax. Those are fears which I regard as unnecessary. There are fears that jobs will be lost and that factories will be run down. Those points of view, mainly of the Opposition, will, I fear, lead to the general opinion that it is bad to have foreign investment and that foreign takeovers are bad for Britain. That is a general premise that I challenge from my own experience.

[Mr. Graham Riddick]

Before I became a Member of the House, I was in industry. I worked for an American company; I worked for a British company; I worked for a British company that was taken over by an American company; and I worked for an American company that went into partnership with a British company. Having worked for companies which were owned by foreign companies, I would say that, generally speaking, they are a force for economic good. Their investment in this country has contributed significantly to prosperity and jobs.

I was hoping to have time to go through some of the machinations which went on during my time in those companies, but time is short. The last thing that I or my company would have wanted would have been to have the Government interfering and trying to alter the decisions that needed to be taken. Overseas investment and takeovers are part and parcel of an open world trading. We cannot pick and choose which ones we approve of and which we do not. With our now thriving exporting companies and exporting tradition, we are the last country that should be stifling free international trade. We should not be erecting barriers of any kind, be it in trade or investment. As we know, internal investment in the United Kingdom from overseas is good for Britain. It is part of the exchange of ideas and approaches. It brings expertise, investment, jobs and prosperity into the United Kingdom.

We should not forget that Britain, too, is playing its role. In the first four months of this year, British companies have made takeover bids for about 68 companies in Europe. However, the most certain way for public companies to protect themselves against unwelcome takeover bids is to ensure maximum efficiency, maximum competitiveness and continuous investment and planning.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that Rowntree has not done that?

Mr. Riddick: I am saying that the premium that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) says can be squeezed out after takeover bids is not there. Therefore, it is up to British companies to ensure their competitiveness. If British companies do that, their share prices will reflect all those factors and their shareholders will be satisfied. It would make it far more difficult for outside companies to mount successful takeover bids. One need consider only companies such as ICI, Marks and Spencer and Trusthouse Forte, which have not been on the end of takeover bids.

The hon. Members for Dagenham and for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) both referred to the employment implications of the takeover bid and suggested that the Swiss predator would threaten employment prospects at Rowntree. I do not know whether that is true, but I think that Opposition Members would be quite happy if a British company were making a bid for Rowntree. If, say, Hanson Trust, which has a reputation for squeezing every last ounce of efficiency out of every company, were making a bid for Rowntree, fears for jobs might be far greater.

I regret that I have not had the time to develop those points as I would have wished. We, in this country and in this Government, cannot afford to risk the inward and outward investment which has served this country extremely well over the past eight years and which has brought increasing prosperity and jobs to this country. That is why I shall vote against the motion.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): In my constituency there is a Rowntree factory which employs about 1,100 workers. It is a long-established employer in a city that has lost much of its manufacturing industry during the past decade. The business was founded in 1883 by Albert Caley. It was taken over by Mackintosh in 1932, and Mackintosh merged with Rowntree in 1969.

We have no illusions in Norwich about Rowntree, but we have even fewer illusions about outside predators which appear to be proof against takeovers. When the Norwich factory was taken over by Rowntree, it employed 2,000 workers. We have had major redundancies in 1981, 1984, 1986 and 1988 and there has been much concern about its rundown. Two important lines were closed this year, although we understand that new products are to be brought forward in the factory. The company has issued a statement committing itself to its existing manufacturing plant. It is a modern, efficient and profitable plant and its return on assets is as good as that of any other plant in the group.

Mr. Tom Clarke: In relation to my hon. Friend's point about manufacturing, does he accept that in Scotland in the three major locations of the industry, in Glasgow, Girvan and Coatbridge, the work force and the management are arguing that the company's policy on investment, training and development has meant that less capital has been available and, because the shares are therefore not valued as highly as they might otherwise have been, they are being penalised for that investment?

Mr. Garrett: I hope to come to that point in the remaining few minutes available to me. However, I thank my hon. Friend for his useful intervention.

Our motion simply condemns the Government for their failure to refer the bid to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission and calls for a policy on monopolies and mergers. From the attack on chauvinism and xenophobia from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, one would never have known that that was all that we were asking. Our point about referral relates not so much to this case as to the principles involved. Referral would have committed an informed analysis and a public debate about the national interest in such bids because several questions of national interest are raised by it.

Lord Young seemed to show remarkable naivety when he said that a foreign bidder would not acquire Rowntree simply to close substantial parts of it. Rowntree was valued at about £4 per share before the bid—the latest offer is £9·50. What accounts for the difference? It is the valuation that the Swiss place on the decades of investment by that company and on brand names, but brand names hardly show up in the balance sheet. Therefore, Rowntree's vulnerability has nothing to do with economic performance, but relates to the kind of business that it is and the short-termism of the City which persistently undervalues that kind of investment.

Brand names are portable. Years ago I worked as a consultant for the Rowntree group when it was producing a famous brand of foreign chocolate. A successful bidder could produce products with the same labels anywhere.

Employment is not necessarily tied to the product. Without an undertaking to maintain employment in Rowntree plants in Britain, a successful bidder could well transfer production and act significantly against the national interest. Why do not the Government seek an undertaking from the bidders about their plans for future employment? A company which is paying £10 or more per share for a company with assets of under £4 per share is likely to want to cut costs and to realise assets.

A reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission would also enable some thought to be given to the single market in 1992. We have heard a lot about reciprocity so far as the Swiss are concerned, but, of course, it applies also to the West Germans. While the shares of British companies are freely traded and are largely held by institutions which have no conception of the national interest, British firms will be sitting ducks for takeovers. We can see from the development of monopolies and mergers policy in the EEC that the likelihood is that EEC law will embody an EEC preference if it is not to give an open door to predators from outside the EEC or require some kind of reciprocity on the part of companies that are outside the EEC. There is no evidence that the Government have considered that problem.

Conservative Members have made great defences of Nestlé and of its investment in Britain. Nestlé has bought several brands in Britain, but in the past six years its share of the market has halved in the cases of Findus and Ashbourne and more than halved in the cases of Crosse and Blackwell and Libby. The company has substantially cut its employment in Britain. If we apply that record to Rowntree's success the outlook is not very encouraging. Nestlé has been widely criticised worldwide for selling its milk products in the Third world. It is constantly a target for boycotts. It would be ironic if Rowntree, with its history of social conscience, were at the receiving end of boycotts as a result of being tied to Nestlé's policy of selling milk in Africa.

Rowntree is a victim of short-termism and of no thought being paid to the national interest. The Government have no concern for the matter. The people of Norwich will know who to blame if there are job losses. They will blame Lord Young and his finger puppet, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I shall take up only a few seconds of the House's time but I should like to put three brief points to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

First, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster opened the debate for the Government, he once again made it clear that he was not prepared to consider issues such as the European dimension as suitable to be referred to the MMC in the context of the Rowntree-Nestlé case. It is ludcrous for his Department to send out various signals, including those in the Secretary of State's interview on "The Money Programme" on BBC2 and in The Observer on 8 May, when he referred to the possibility of changes, including the possibility of larger conglomerations in the United Kingdom market, if at the same time he is not prepared even to consider that such issues deserve three weeks' or even three months' examination by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That is absurd. We must have a clear signal about what the future will hold.

Secondly, this issue is not about competition. It is about the acquisition by two Swiss companies of a major confectionery company holding a major slice of the European market. Rowntree plus Nestlé would have a 27 per cent. share of the French market. Is that or is that not a competitive matter? It should be, in relation to the EC. Those issues must be addressed.

Thirdly and finally, the interest, anxiety and commitment shown by all the people who are associated with the Rowntree company suggest that that company, which for between 50 and 100 years has established millions of satisfied consumers with its brands and which has rates of sale running at millions per week, is a company to be proud of, and that we should seek to assist it.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): This has been a short but important debate. Two weeks ago, the Government had a choice. They could refer Nestlé's bid for Rowntree to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for objective scrutiny as to whether the bid was in the public interest, or they could leave the issue of Rowntree's independence solely to the subjective assessment of its day-to-day shareholders. The Government chose the latter. We believe that decision to have been wrong for Rowntree but, moreover, we believe that it will have the most profound and adverse consequences for all United Kingdom industry. In advance of 1992 and the single European market, it will signal that Britain, uniquely among EC countries, is prepared to put its industrial future in the hands of market forces. As the slogan says, history may be in the making, but it will be made by the whim of the market rather than the will of the people.

There are several obvious reasons for a reference and much has been said in favour of them today. There is, of course, the interest of the work force. I find extraordinary the degree to which the Government are prepared to put faith in the institutional shareholders to come to a rational decision about the company's future, but they seem to count for nothing the views of the work force. Those workers have been employed by the company for years and have created the profit upon which the institutional shareholders depend.

Mr. Martlew: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and I am sorry that I was not called to speak because I was a manager for Nestlé and worked for that company for 21 years.

My hon. Friends the Members for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) and for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) mentioned a meeting we had with the managing director of Nestlé, Mr. Maucher, in the House on 9 May. My hon. Friends are right to say that no assurance was given at that meeting about employment. I am sure that my hon. Friends will recall, however, that I asked the managing director whether the company would keep the headquarters in York. Mr. Maucher said that the company would not be subservient to Croydon, but would be answerable to Switzerland. That decision will not only save the jobs at the York headquarters, but will save the jobs of the sales force and those in distribution, about which my hon. Friends expressed concern.

[Mr. Martlew]

I accept that assurance on the basis of my experience of takeovers carried out by Nestlé. If Nestlé had decided to amalgamate the companies and move the headquarters to Croydon, all the jobs would have been lost. If I was the mayor of York I would have the Hansard record of this assurance blown up and put in the council chamber to remind Nestlé of the assurance that their managing director gave hon. Members in this House.

Mr. Blair: That is one reason why it is absolutely right to refer the bid to the MMC, so that that undertaking can be properly tested.

The second obvious reason for reference is the importance of the industry to the region. The third obvious reason is that we cannot look at Rowntree without considering the fate of Cadbury. The two are linked because, the day after Nestlé launched its bid for Rowntree, General Cinema said that it would no longer remain a passive investor in Cadbury, and that it had set aside $1 billion for acquisitions. There is an obvious risk that that company will make a bid for Cadbury and, if successful, will sell off the confectionery part of Cadbury to whoever loses the bid for Rowntree.

In this debate we are talking about not just the 12,000 jobs at Rowntree or about the importance of Rowntree to the region, but the importance of an entire manufacturing sector to the United Kingdom. Those reasons alone would have justified reference to the MMC.

We have heard a great deal about reciprocity, but it is worth reminding hon. Members that the word came from the mergers document published by the Government in March. The Government have put reciprocity on the agenda. The reason why the Government believe that reciprocity should be a factor—they are right to think it—is not due to some tit-for-tat retaliation against firms that do not offer reciprocal facilities, but because lack of reciprocity is an element in unfair competition.

Ministers may say that there is no formal legislative bar on British companies taking over Swiss companies, but by the operation of the commercial code in Switzerland and as a result of the recommendations of its largest self-regulating financial body, the Bankers Association, no hostile bid by our companies or any other company could be mounted in Switzerland. I will give way to the Minister if he can tell me when such a hostile bid has been made. The truth is that no hostile bids are possible. If that is the case, it is clearly a further factor that should be considered.

When I first considered this matter, I thought that Switzerland was perhaps in a unique position vis-a-vis other EEC countries and that it had unique barriers against hostile takeover bids. It is Britain, however, that is in the unique position, because it has an open season for foreign hostile bids. In case anyone believes that that is not important, it is clear as we approach 1992 and the single European market that cross-border merger activity will increase. In 1987 there were more than 1,000 such acquisitions and that, excluding United States companies, represented an increase of almost 40 per cent.

The Minister said that the United Kingdom has made acquisitions in Europe, and in 1987 the United Kingdom made 134 such acquisitions. The total value of those acquisitions, however, comes to less than half the value of the Nestlé and Suchard bid for Rowntree. That puts such acquisitions in context. More importantly, in the research that I have made I have been unable to discover a single hostile bid from the United Kingdom—I shall gladly give way to the Minister if that is not the case. They were all agreed bids.

The Minister has said that 1992 is relevant, but I believe that difficulties lie ahead. We know that cross-border activity is on the increase. We also know that Britain has a unique open system that is not available in the rest of Europe whether that is West Germany, France, Belgium, the Netherlands or even outside the EC in Japan. All those countries have effective financial and corporate structures that prevent hostile takeover bids. When corporate activity increases, foreign predators will look for an outlet in the EC. They shall decide what companies they seek to acquire. The danger is that, if they are prevented from taking over companies elsewhere in the EC, they will come to Britain. The danger for Britain is that it will become uniquely open for predators.

It simply will not do to say that reciprocity is simply about Switzerland or about some type of nationalist protection. I do not believe that Ministers have understood the case that has been made by British industry. British industry is not asking for special favours, it is not asking for unfair protection or for the playing field to be sloped in its direction. It is asking for a level playing field. It is asking for our Government to do no more in relation to our industry than other EC Governments do in relation to theirs. If the Government fail to act, Britain will have a uniquely open system. When Britain's doors are open for business, the doors of other EC countries will be closed, and therefore the queue will come to our door.

Perhaps the Government think that that threat can be taken lightly. In the past few weeks I have scoured the financial pages to discover the types of company that the financial press now believe will be put into play as a result of the Rowntree decision. It is not the Labour party that has said this, but the financial press, and it has been confirmed by the article by Sir Hector Laing to which reference has already been made. We already know about Cadbury, but the other companies at risk are United Biscuits, Tate and Lyle, Rank Hovis McDougall, Allied Lyons, Dalgety, Unigate, Northern Foods, Boots, Reckitt and Colman, Fisons, and Beecham Group. [AN HON. MEMBER: "So what?"] I will tell the hon. Gentleman so what. If the entire structure for decision-making within United Kingdom industry passes outside United Kingdom control in the aftermath of 1992 there will be no guarantee that we shall control our industrial future. Conservative Members may say that that is an unreal fear, but the country must decide whom to believe. Do they believe the representatives of industry and the CBI? Do they believe the Sir Hector Laings of this world who support the Conservative party, or do they believe Conservative Members? The truth is that the Government have decided simply to leave these matters to market forces. Who are these great rational decision-makers in the market? Who are these people in whom the Government put such touching faith as coming to decisions in the interests of British industry?

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham described exactly what will happen to the share price of Rowntree during the last few weeks. Is it seriously being suggested that all institutional shareholders are considering what is in the long-term interests of Rowntree employees, the company and the region? Are they sitting wondering how United Kingdom manufacturing industry will fare under this new regime? They are interested only in the share price, and that is not a temptation but a duty. When the Government say that this is all about a view of the long-term performance of the industry, they are talking nonsense. Shareholders are merely seeing what the day-to-day share price is; when it doubles in more than two months, naturally they will feel obliged to sell. We are saying that we cannot allow decisions of this importance simply to be left in the hands of those institutional shareholders.

In their merger policy published in March, the Government said that there were public interest matters that had to be taken into account; some of the issues mentioned were employment, regional economic development, research and development, and even foreign takeovers. They went on to say:

"The Government's view is that none of the matters mentioned . . . is one where the public interest typically diverges from the interests of private sector decision-makers."

That is the theology that says that the private market and the public good naturally coincide, but the Rowntree issue has proved that that view is wholly out of date. This Government have turned their back on industry and it must now look to Labour.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Francis Maude): These debates that we have from time to time about specific mergers and merger policy allow us to discuss important fundamental issues, and the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has touched on some of them. But they all boil down to the fact that the Opposition have a deep hatred and fear of the free enterprise system. Mergers, essentially contested mergers, are the most obvious manifestation of the free enterprise system which they hate and fear. That is why they use these debates to mount an attack on the system. If there is one thing that they hate and fear more than United Kingdom free enterprise it is foreign free enterprise, and a great deal of this debate has been about good old-fashioned chauvinism wrapped up in a disreputable fig leaf. Many of their arguments have been disreputable and have done them no credit.

Any hostile or resisted bid for a well-known local company arouses anxieties in the region, and it is bound to. It is unsettling and no one knows what the future will hold, so it is natural that those involved should make representations to their local Members of Parliament. I know well the genuine anxieties of some of my right hon. and hon. Friends about this. They, properly, consider it their duty to make representations on behalf of those local interests. When something causes anxiety in this way politicians seek to take action and the only action available to them or the Government is to seek a reference to the MMC. That is what my hon. Friends have properly done. The Government took the view that in this case a reference was an inappropriate use of that instrument of Government policy for reasons which I shall come to.

I resent assertions from Labour Members that our merger policy is in some way unclear. We state clearly in the document from which the hon. Gentleman quoted that competition is the principal consideration, and nothing could be clearer than that. What emerges from the debate is that the Opposition want our policy to be less clear, and want many other considerations also to be taken into account. They want us, in unknown and unstated mergers, to give way to employment and regional considerations, and nothing could be less clear than that. That would be to muddy the waters and make it less easy for those who seek to know exactly what our policy is.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) and others said that employment should be a consideration, and that no guarantee of job security has been given by the bidders. No guarantee of job security exists under the present management, nor could it possibly do so. There is not a single company in the country under public sector, private sector, United Kingdom or foreign ownership which can give an absolute guarantee of job security. The complaint that a bid is made without any absolute guarantee of job security is absurd and the hon. Gentleman must know that. There is absolutely no reason to suppose that jobs are any more at risk under Nestlé and Suchard than under the present management. Suchard has said in terms that if it were successful—I have no idea whether it will be—it will move its headquarters of the whole confectionery business to York.

Our policy is clear, consistent, fair and as apt to deal with the considerations of the single market in Europe as with purely United Kingdom mergers. The underlying complaint seems to be that the policy is not slanted to protect United Kingdom companies from foreign takeover. We believe that open markets and the freedom of money and investment to move across frontiers has been beneficial to the United Kingdom, and that flow has been predominantly by United Kingdom companies making investments overseas. There is now twice as much United Kingdom investment overseas as foreign investment in the United Kingdom. The policy of open markets has benefited us and we propose to continue with it.

Labour Members seem to think that it is bad news when foreign companies invest in the United Kingdom and equally when British companies invest overseas. They want an old-fashioned siege economy. They do not understand that times have moved on. We now live in an age of the international economy. No single economy can exist on its own. There will be cross-investment. The whole concept of a national company does not exist.

Mr. Blair rose——

Mr. Maude: I shall not give way because we are short of time and I have a few further points to make.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) asked about a draft EC mergers regulation. It is thought that some sort of mergers regime will automatically solve all the problems, but there are different and conflicting concerns, and a single draft mergers regulation cannot resolve them all. I assure him that on 22 June when this is discussed at the Council of Ministers we shall approach this positively and consider carefully how to take it forward. But we do not now know how the draft regulation will end up. Many matters remain unclear—not just drafting problems, but fundamentals. There remain several alternative formulations within the draft and the wording is by no means clear. Several of the fundamentals are left unsettled. Certainly we are not saying that we are against this but we want to make sure that the form in which it emerges is suitable.

Shareholders are best placed to make the decisions. There have been some unsavoury remarks during the debate about the institutional shareholders who have to make some of the decisions. Institutional shareholders are not for the most part holding the shares on their own account. They are running pension funds, and they have a moral and legal obligation to pay pensions and to ensure that investors get a proper return on their money. So they have to ensure that they make the right decisions on behalf of the individuals who have entrusted their money to them. The upshot of the Opposition's remarks is that individuals who have invested money in pension funds would be short-changed by Government intervention, causing the return on their investment to be reduced. It is as simple as that. A pension fund, which has to provide pensions in future, has, above all institutional investors, an obligation to look to the long term. Institutional investors do not deal simply with short-term interest.

The time has gone when it is appropriate for companies resisting bids to look to the Government as their first line of defence. It is for them to persuade shareholders that their management offers the best hope. So I have no hesitation in commending to my right hon. and hon. Friends the Government's amendment and in urging them to reject the Opposition motion.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises the benefits which inward and outward investment have brought to the British economy; endorses the Government's merger policy as set out in the Department of Trade and Industry's paper on the policy and procedures of merger control published on 3rd March 1988; and supports the decision not to refer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission Nestle's bid for Rowntree or Suchard's 29·9 per cent. holding in Rowntree, as being consistent with that policy.

7.13 pm

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): On a point of order, Mr Speaker. You may be aware that today the South African authorities attacked the British Broadcasting Corporation and its coverage of events in South Africa. They have done so in writing. Is it not in order for the Home Secretary to repudiate this unwarranted interference in the affairs of the BBC and to come to the House and explain his and the Government's response?

[Mr. Nigel Griffiths]

Mr. Speaker: That is not a point of order. I am sure that what the hon. Gentleman has said has been heard by Ministers on the Front Bench.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: It was not a point of order. This matter could properly be raised tomorrow.

Rover Group

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the debate on the British Aerospace bid for the Rover Group. I must tell the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

7.14 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I beg to move,

That this House believes that the recent improvement in Rover Group's performance owes much to the efforts of the workforce and demonstrates what can be achieved by long term investment and public ownership; sees no real industrial logic in the proposed takeover of Rover by British Aerospace; deplores the give-away terms on which Rover is to be disposed of; demands assurances that the investment will be made in a new model range in order to provide the essential guarantee for Rover to remain a volume car manufacturer; and calls upon the Government to manifest its belief in the need to maintain British volume car manufacture by retaining Rover in public ownership and ensuring that the necessary investment is made.

We debated the proposed takeover by British Aerospace of Rover just five weeks ago, but I make no apology for returning to the subject because today we at least have a chance to vote on our motion. Five weeks have elapsed and we now have the opportunity to ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and his ministerial colleagues about the developments during that time. We also have a renewed chance to express our grave concern about the future of British volume car manufacturing.

In recent months we have debated and considered a whole range of different industrial questions. We have debated British Steel and British Shipbuilders and we looked at the Girobank only yesterday. Earlier today we considered Rowntree. In each of those cases the circumstances have been different. The issues have also been a little different but in each case the Government's attitude has been the same. They have made it perfectly clear that they will accept no responsibility whatever for the future fortunes of British industry.

I am reminded of the debate that we had towards, I think, the end of 1986 when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, confronted with the fact that British manufacturing industry had seen a deterioration in its trading performance since 1979 of £13 billion—the figure is now £17 billion—said that that was neither here nor there. That epitomises the Government's attitude to our manufacturing industry.

In this instance we see the Government's determination to wash their hands, on ideological grounds, of any part of British industry that happens to be in public ownership. Their prime concern, indeed their only concern, is to sell where possible at whatever price they can get. If they cannot get any price at all they will give whatever it may be away for nothing. That is true of the Govan shipyards and of the Rover Group.

When asked about jobs, about what happens to our strategic capacity in some of these important industries and about national interests, the Government are all too keen to say that from the moment privatisation is contemplated they cease to have any responsibility. They say that only the market prevails and that only the market must decide. Nowhere is this attitude more clearly demonstrated than in the British Aerospace bid for Rover, and nowhere is it more acutely important than in this case.

As I said on 4 May, we are talking about the future, indeed the survival, of the one remaining indigenously owned and controlled volume car manufacturer in Britain.

If, as a consequence of the Government's manoeuvring, and as a consequence of the British Aerospace takeover, Rover Group should go out of business after five years, and we should no longer have a volume car manufacturer in this country under British ownership, from that moment we would become the one advanced industrial country to have given up that capacity. Already, we are at the bottom of the league of the G7 countries. We have already been overtaken by Spain in terms of car production. If we were to lose the Rover Group as the last British-controlled volume car manufacturer, we would be left without any capacity whatsoever in that crucial sector of our economy. We would have departed from a major technology and we would be unable to control the future direction of what traditionally, and for very good reason, has been regarded as the linchpin of a modern industrialised economy.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): Rubbish.

Mr. Gould: I invite the hon. Gentleman to intervene. From a sedentary position he comments that that is rubbish Perhaps he can explain, if we retain no indigenous capacity whatsoever and if our car manufacturing is entirely that of a branch production line, and a satellite economy, how from the national viewpoint we will control that new technology, new capacity and the whole hinterland of industrial activity that depends on motor car manufacture.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: Yes, by all means. Of course I was not referring to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) a moment ago, but if he wishes to rush to the defence of his hon. Friend I am delighted to allow him to do so.

Mr. Marlow: I am doubly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy. Does he consider that to stop what he would consider terrible things taking place, with which he is trying to frighten us at the moment, the next Labour Government, which he believes might come to pass, would immediately renationalise the Rover Group?

Mr. Gould: I can do better than that. I can tell the hon. Gentleman our response to a real and actual situation. We believe that there is absolutely no case for changing the ownership of the Rover Group. Evidence shows, and the record shows, that it has failed under private ownership and prospered as a consequence of taxpayers' investment under public ownership, and very grave risks are being taken quite unnecessarily and quite unjustifiably in disturbing its present ownership.

It is all too obvious that none of that matters to the present Government. I am not surprised that they are unwilling to be challenged on this point. They are concerned only with their ideology. If the worst comes to the worst they want to say that it is not their responsibility. Their sole concern is to get shot of that industry and to offload Rover Group so that they can say in future that it is entirely a matter of market forces and commercial considerations as to whether that indigenous industry survives.

It so happens that I have been passed a confidential document produced by the Conservative research department. It is a long document and is rather boring and uninformative, but it begins with a very interesting statement which I shall read to the House:

"The takeover of Rover by British Aerospace offers a quick and attractive way of fulfilling the Government's commitment of returning the Group to the private sector."

I invite the House to notice the word "quick". That immediately and accurately sums up the flavour of what the Government are about. They are looking for speed, ease and lack of responsibility. It reinforces my contention that they are concerned simply with getting shot of the industry irrespective of the possible consequences to our economy.

Let me make it clear that we are committed to the future of the industry. We believe that it is important that this major industry should remain in British hands. We believe that, notwithstanding the remark of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), it is important to our industrial future, that we should retain that industrial capacity. I am astonished that anyone representing a midlands constituency should argue otherwise. No Government can escape their responsibilities for protecting and preserving that industry and giving it the chance to prosper and survive. The Government have a responsibility not to ensure profitability of a given company in a given year, but at least to ensure that we retain an essential industrial capacity. If that industrial capacity did not survive, it would have to be regarded as a failure of Government policy.

Mr. Roger King: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman with keen interest and I have yet to hear an argument why we should not privatise the existing Rover Group. If we consider the examples of privatisation within the car industry—Jaguar is a fine example—we can see exactly the benefits of privatisation. Nothing except taxpayers' money has helped Rover Group since it was nationalised. It has not developed in the way in which Jaguar has developed in the private sector. Presumably the hon. Gentleman would condemn the privatisation of Jaguar as a complete failure.

Mr. Gould: Anyone looking at the record in that sector of British industry would be bound to conclude that under private ownership it would have foundered, and it very nearly did founder. Public ownership came to its rescue and public ownership has maintained that industrial capacity. The last time that we debated these matters, my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) pointed out that if we are to go through a catalogue of the privatisation of various parts of British Leyland, or whatever it may have been called at the time, we have to consider Coventry Climax, Alvis and Self-Changing Gears. Those companies have disappeared and if we are not very careful exactly the same fate awaits Rover Group. Opposition Members want to make it very clear that it is the Government's responsibility to avoid that. In proposing to change the ownership of Rover Group for reasons of dogma alone they are taking a quite unjustified risk with the future of that industry.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: No. I have a feeling that the hon. Gentleman is going to return to an arid issue which concerns some hypothetical question, when what we are intent on debating is the future, in hard practical terms——

Mr. Hayward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: No. I wish to press on with my speech.

There is no case for changing the ownership of Rover Group. As I said on 4 May, given the likelihood that it will happen, Opposition Members are realists and do not wish to do or say anything that would jeopardise the future of that group, and particularly of the industrial capacity and employment it provides. But we have the right to put to the Minister the legitimate concerns that we feel and that are shared by many others beyond this Chamber as to whether the deal provides the assurances that we think are necessary if the future of the Rover Group is to be guaranteed.

We are unimpressed, as are most of the experts who have commented on the matter, by the arguments about synergy. As I said on 4 May, we think that that is an attractive and fashionable term which no doubt comes out well in glossy television advertisements, but if one talks to the production engineers and the experts in the industry, they will confirm that synergy is an extremely elusive advantage. Let us set aside as being mere adman's babble the notion of synergy. No case in industrial logic has been made for the takeover. Let us now consider a much more important question.

We should consider whether the deal, if it goes through, will provide the investment that the Rover Group will need desperately if it is to survive as a volume car manufacturer. The best estimate is that it will need about £1 billion during the next four or five years. We are entitled to ask where the money is to come from. Where will that investment be generated?

When Roland Smith and others from British Aerospace said that they believe that the investment will be generated by Rover, they were living in cloud-cuckoo-land. Rover may have moved briefly into profit—that is a considerable achievement that owes a great deal not so much to the highly lauded Graham Day as to an excellent and dedicated work force who have put in a great effort for a long time—but the profit was about £27 million. There is little guarantee, for reasons that I shall come to, that even that level of profitability can be guaranteed, and it is inadequate to generate anything like the investment that will be needed if Rover is to develop the new model lines that will maintain it as a volume car manufacturer.

I suspect that when the attempt is made to convince us and others that the deal will provide the necessary investment, given its implausibility, what we shall really be told is that the deal is not intended to produce a continuing capacity in volume car manufacturing. That is what I think is in the mind of British Aerospace and of Graham Day, and it is what we are intended to assume from these highly incredible assumptions. Rover, with 15 per cent. of the market, is too small and not profitable enough to generate its own investment for the time being.

Mr. Roger King: What about exports?

Mr. Gould: We should consider what is likely to happen to our ability to compete in international markets. Like British Aerospace, Rover is directly affected by movements in the exchange rate. Indeed, Rover is much more sensitive and vulnerable to movements against the deutschmark than is British Aerospace, which is much more concerned with movements against the dollar.

Rover's ability to compete, and its profitability, will be and are being gravely affected by the pound rising against the deutschmark. There can be no doubt about that, and any Industry Minister worth his salt would be the first to say so and to argue, against his Treasury colleagues, that the rise in the exchange rate is doing great damage to important British industries.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is my hon. Friend aware, as I am, that British Aerospace has in the past few weeks had to set aside £320 million to combat the effects of the changing value of the pound against the dollar? Since our debates on this topic on 4 and 12 May, British Aerospace has announced 1,100 redundancies at Filton in Bristol, so when it comes to investment and job security, aerospace and car workers are fearful and apprehensive about this privatisation, sell-off and false merger.

Mr. Gould: My hon. Friend is quite right. I shall come back to British Aerospace in a moment. We ought to be clear, however, that Rover is being adversely affected by exchange rate movements.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gould: No. I have given way quite a lot already.

There are other developments in the pipeline that are equally worrying for Rover's profitability. If, for example, EC standards on exhaust emissions are adopted—I recognise that the Government have done all they can to resist them, but I suspect that it is in the nature of things that we shall get them in the end—Rover's profitability will disappear in a puff of exhaust smoke as it will find it expensive and difficult to convert its present model range to meet the new standards. [HON. MEMBERS: "That is nonsense."]

The hon. Member for Northfield asked about Rover's performance in international markets. The British market is very important to Rover. It has only 15 per cent., but it is by far its biggest market. After a welcome improvement which led to the share of imports in the British market dropping—miraculously one might say—to 49·5 per cent. last year, it is running at 54·5 per cent. this year. Last year was the first time for many years that imports fell below 50 per cent. of the market. Import penetration this year, however, is on the way up again and will cost us £1·4 billion on our balance of payments. That is the effect of the exchange rate on Rover and its profitability.

I shall return to the central question with which I wish to confront the Chancellor of the Duchy. If Rover needs, as it clearly does, substantial investment during the next four of five years to stay in business as a volume car manufacturer, where is the money to come from? It will certainly not come from Rover. Is it to come from British Aerospace? It too is most certainly unable to provide the investment. It has its own problems.

Last week, I visited the excellent British Aerospace plant at Chester. I saw the wonderful work that is being done there. Great investment has been made in Airbus wings and on the HS125. It is a most impressive plant. It was impressed on me—quite innocently, as my hosts were not to know that we would debate these matters in the next few days—that the development and the investment were immensely expensive. Millions of pounds are being invested in new equipment which was being installed even while I visited the factory.

That investment has embarrassed British Aerospace in terms of its cash flow. It cannot generate anything like the investment needed for Rover. Indeed, it probably cannot generate any investment as it needs help itself. I am sure that the Chancellor of the Duchy will confirm that it has been to the Government to ask for help to cover for losses now staring it in the face on its Airbus work.

The losses have arisen for exactly the same reason as Rover and every other sector of British manufacturing industry has been embarrassed recently—the exchange rate has made the Airbus and work on it extremely unprofitable. It is not just Airbus that is affected. British Aerospace is clear that if it is to sell civil aircraft such as the HS125 or the HS146, it can do so at a profit only if the pound stays at $1·70 or lower.

British Aerospace is having to make cuts, to seek Government help and to send hundreds of millions of pounds' worth of Airbus development on sub-contract to the United States to escape the exchange rate trap. It is short of cash, it is involved in a massive capital investment programme—for which it deserves great credit—and it has very little to sell in the short term. What does it do? It looks to somebody who at least has something to sell. Whatever its other weaknesses in the market, Rover has cars in the showroom. At the taxpayers' expense, Rover has made a great deal of the required expenditure.

We covered this ground when we last debated the subject. The likelihood—indeed, it is almost a certainty—is not that the takeover, or merger, between British Aerospace and Rover will generate a flow of cash or of investment capital from British Aerospace to Rover, for it will certainly not be anything like the volume needed to meet Rover's need for investment. The virtual certainty is that any flow will be in the reverse direction. It will occur for four or five years, which is the extent of the legal undertakings given by British Aerospace.

The £800 million of taxpayers' money which is to be given away to British Aerospace will finance the process. Far from guaranteeing any investment or any future for Rover, we find a prospect of Rover and those who work in it being guaranteed a future lasting five years, financed by the taxpayer, during which they will be milked for cash.

British Aerospace will then say that it finds it difficult to maintain volume car manufacturing, that it is happy to keep the odd bit, that it has always been interested in Land Rover and that it might be able to make a go of it—that was what it wanted in the first place—but although it was offered such an attractive deal with so much cash in hand to keep the volume car business going for a short time, it is no longer viable. Thus, the Rover Group and volume car manufacturing in this country will come to an end.

What will the Government say, if they are still in power, and I pray that they will not be? They will say, "It is all to do with commercial considerations and market forces. If we lose that important industrial capacity"—and one or two midlands Conservative Members of Parliament at the same time—"that will be something over which we shall have no control." That is what is in prospect and is the logic of the position. We shall listen to the Chancellor with interest and see what logic he advances.

That is our persuasive interpretation of the position. We are entitled to ask the Chancellor what difference the past five weeks have made. What further can he say to allay our fears?

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Nothing.

Mr. Gould: That is extremely depressing news. On 4 May the right hon. and learned Gentleman failed to give any assurances about investment and the future of the industry. Notably, he failed to give any assurances—he repeated this performance before the Select Committee—about employment.

Those who work for the Rover Group are, with good reason, extremely concerned about their jobs. They know that, for the reasons that I have outlined, the possibility of British Aerospace remaining committed to car manufacturing is slight. They know that British Aerospace, which has no commitment to the car business, is likely to find major assets such as the site at south Cowley, which could be realised at a substantial profit, very tempting. That is the immediate danger, which is why those workers are right to be worried that they have not been given any assurances by British Aerospace or the Government.

It is generally agreed that the immediate future of the Rover Group depends to a large degree on its relationship with Honda. So far we have heard nothing more than bland and vacuous assurances about how benignly Honda looks on this arrangement. I hope that the Minister will say more about what Honda has in mind for continuing collaboration.

What about the problems that have arisen with the EC? The Minister will concede that he will have a substantial argument on his hands if he is to persuade Commissioner Sutherland that £800 million of taxpayers' money is not a hidden subsidy. It may be one thing to write off debts, but, as the Rover Group's indebtedness amounts to no more than £560 million, the Minister will have the awkward task of explaining what the other £240 million represents. We therefore need to know what will happen if Commissioner Sutherland chooses to exercise powers under the treaty of Rome and says "No. I am not having the £800 million. I may accept £500 million or, if I am feeling generous, £600 million."

What will happen if the deal does not turn out as Professor Smith has been selling it to his shareholders? What will happen if the cash on the table is not £800 million but a substantially smaller sum? Will the deal be called off? Will Professor Smith be able to sell it to his shareholders? If the British Aerospace deal falls down because it is vetoed by the EC, or because in a form approved by the EC it is unsaleable to British Aerospace shareholders, what will be the Government's fall-back position? What guarantee will they give that the Rover Group will stay in business? What are its other prospects? Who else has been interested? What other bids are likely to come forward, and how serious are they?

We need to know the answers to those questions because the Government have unwisely put all their eggs in the British Aerospace basket. To listen to Government Ministers one would think that there is no future for the Rover Group other than with British Aerospace. If British Aerospace departs the scene for any reason, we need to know—as does the Rover Group and its employees—where the Government will stand. Will they give a continuing commitment to invest in the Rover Group as a public sector car manufacturing company, or is there another bidder in the offing, who has been kept at arm's length so far? If so, who is it?

The Government are always interested in the Labour party's plans. They are obliged to say what is their contingency plan. If we do not receive answers to our questions, it will be perfectly clear that the charge that I levelled at the Government—that they have no interest or commitment to the maintenance of the industry—will be proved to the hilt.

We must not forget that British Aerospace is at risk as a consequence of this deal. It may be dragged down, as have others in the past, by its association with the less profitable parts of the British car industry. Those who work for the Rover Group and British Aerospace are concerned about their future.

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) is not backing Britain.

Mr. Gould: I am backing Britain, but I want assurances, guarantees and some evidence of commitment from the Government to the maintenance of the industry. I want the issues to be debated properly and developed. We have not been given any commitment, assurance or guarantee but a solution that, in the words of the Conservative party's research department, is a "quick" one, a quick fix. It may be attractive to the Conservative party, but it is not to those who want a flourishing British car industry or those whose livelihoods depend on its existence.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move to leave out from 'House' to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'believes that the recent improvement in Rover Group's performance owes much to the efforts of the workforce and management combined, that further improvement can best be achieved by returning the business to full private ownership, that the proposed takeover by British Aerospace is to be warmly welcomed and is in the interests of Rover Group's employees as well as those of its suppliers and dealer network, that future investment should be a matter for the management of the business and the prospective new owners, and that the overall terms of the sale agreement are in the interests not only of the companies but also of the taxpayer.'

This is an Opposition Supply day and they have chosen the subject for debate.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) began by giving a brief explanation of why we are again discussing the Rover Group. We had a full debate five weeks ago about the agreement between British Aerospace and the Rover Group which is conditional on the conclusion of negotiations with the European Commission. Subsequently it will go to an extraordinary general meeting of British Aerospace shareholders.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to update the House about the events of the past five weeks, but there have not been any; we are having the same debate as we had five weeks ago. As we made clear at that time, we trust that discussions with the Commission will be concluded before the summer. As yet, they have not been, so there is little point in my again explaining the terms of the agreement, which I believe I explained to the satisfaction of most hon. Members in the previous debate.

A wide range of subjects could have been chosen if the Opposition had wished to continue their ideological obsession with the nationalisation of large parts of British industry and their objections to privatisation. At present, we are returning to the private sector the Rover Group, the British Steel Corporation, most British shipyards and Girobank. By returning to the agreement with British Aerospace, the Opposition have returned to the most popular and least controversial of our proposals. Contrary to the description that the hon. Member for Dagenham seemed to be giving, British Aerospace is a popular and successful company. I believe that there has been a widespread welcome for our proposals.

We are able to return those companies to the private sector because of the general well-being of the British economy and because the Government have given the managements of most of those companies their head and allowed them to apply commercial judgments to succeed in the market place. Those companies are now in a position to return to a booming and successful private sector economy.

The hon. Member for Dagenham said that he had returned to the subject of the car industry for this nationalisation versus privatisation debate because of his concern about this sector of the economy in general. He earlier expressed a fear about the chocolate-making industry and said that we are becoming a branch-line economy and moving out of the mainstream of important manufacturing industries. It is singularly ill-timed for him to make comments of that sort about the United Kingdom vehicle industry, into which the Rover Group is about to return as a private sector company. We have had a good time in the United Kingdom vehicle industry over the past year or two. The outlook for all our companies is better than it has been for a long time.

Let us look at the last complete year, 1987, to see what sort of environment British Aerospace is seeking to buy into. In 1987 we saw the highest production of cars in the United Kingdom for nearly a decade. Productivity in the vehicle industry has increased by almost 7 per cent. each year during the 1980s. That compares with the impressive enough record of nearly 5·5 per cent. a year in manufacturing as a whole. Import penetration continues to decline.

The hon. Member for Dagenham is concerned about short-term fluctuations in the exchange rate and the strike at Ford. Those issues have been the basis of his concern over the past couple of months. More new United Kingdom-built cars were registered in 1987 than in any year since 1973. Seventy per cent. of Ford's and Vauxhall's United Kingdom car sales last year were sourced from United Kingdom factories. Our export markets are being regained. In 1987, the value of United Kingdom car exports increased by 45 per cent. over 1986. There is a general rise in industry's profitability and we are in the splendid position—one in which we have not found ourselves for a long time—that all our major vehicle manufacturers are now in profit. It has been a long time since any Minister has been able to say that to the House.

Mr. Oppenheim: If the British car industry is so successful and if, as we have been told ad infinitum, we are great believers in the rather well-worn level playing field, and if the Government believe in the free market, why do we maintain the ludicrous so-called gentleman's agreement that puts an import quota on Japanese cars when it indirectly benefits the Japanese car industry by giving it a high-priced, cosy and uncompetitive market to sell into, when it compounds the inefficiencies that remain in the British car industry and when it costs consumers dear?

Mr. Clarke: That, as the saying goes, is a very interesting question. I would welcome the opportunity on a more suitable occasion to discuss the balance of argument between those who believe that the agreement protects the British car industry and those who believe that it gives the Japanese a rather easy way of making money. I agree with my hon. Friend that it is an interesting debate, but it is outside the scope of the Opposition Supply day.

Mr. Gould: I hope to put a question to the Chancellor that he will find easier to answer. When we debated this matter on 4 May, the right hon. and learned Gentleman made the unwise claim that Rover had secured record exports. It then emerged that he was claiming that that was true in money value. That it hardly a reliable basis. Will he now confirm that on the only basis that matters, which is the number of vehicles, he was wrong?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member does not have a very good record on answering questions. It is true that I was talking in value terms, and it was a record year in value terms. In one previous year it was better in terms of the number of vehicles. Nevertheless, the export record of the Rover Group now is very good and is going very well. As I have said, the export performance of the British vehicle industry is very good.

The background for privatisation is propitious. It is not a quick dash, at an ill-judged moment, for the Government to decide that this is the time to conclude a reasonable deal with a good British company—British Aerospace—which is interested in acquiring the Rover Group.

The only thing on which I agree with the hon. Gentleman is the congratulations he gave to all those responsible for the improvement in the performance of the Rover Group that has brought us to this stage. We all welcome that. It has been achieved not simply because the company is nationalised but largely because, although it is nationalised, the Government gave the management the freedom to run its own business without political intervention of the sort it had experienced in the past and enabled it to embark upon the major restructuring and fundamental reappraisal of the company's position that was necessary to return it to health and to provide what the customer wants. I am happy to join everybody in the House in commending the work force as well as the management of the Rover Group on the progress that has been made in order to reach the position that enables us to take the next step towards privatisation.

The Labour party's motion and the views of the hon. Member for Dagenham, apart from implying that the Labour party would prefer to return to the nationalisation of the past, present a number of other myths about the present state of the Rover Group, what its strategy should be and where it is going. The Social and Liberal Democratic party's motion is more accurate than the Labour party's. It appears to accept the repeatedly stated strategy of the company, which is that the Rover Group is not now and never will be a stand-alone volume car manufacturer along the lines of the six major European producers. Unlike the Rover Group, with its 500,000 or so vehicles a year production, the other six each turn out over twice that number of cars. Those firms enjoy economies of scale that are not available to the Rover Group and it is not open to the Rover Group to try to replicate their market strategies. That was a false analogy made by the hon. Member for Dagenham.

Under Graham Day's leadership, the Rover Group is pursuing an extremely good alternative strategy that is not based on running down the business. It is using progressive evolution of the product plan to take the business up-market and into specialist niches. It is building on the vital collaborative relationship with Honda. It is true that Honda has confirmed that it welcomes the continuity of management that the deal with British Aerospace represents. It is content with what is proposed. Also, the Rover Group is seeking further to improve its quality compared with other manufacturers. It has to win back its reputation for quality and reliability, and I am sure that we are all confident that it will do so.

Mr. Nellist: The Minister and I agree on one thing and that is that he has accurately stated Graham Day's position. I do not expect the right hon. and learned Gentleman to read the entire report of the Adjournment debate that his colleague the Minister and I had on 12 May. However, in that debate, I quoted Mr. Day as saying:

> "We want to make money. People keep talking of market share, but the objective is to become profitable."—[Official Report, 12 May 1988; Vol. 133. c.578.]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said, it is not about continuing volume car production, which is the only safe guarantee of the jobs of car workers.—[Interruption.]

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman gives figures about exports for the British car industry over the past couple of years, he is basing those figures on the artificial boom that we have had in the past couple of years in the British economy and on a specific set of exchange rates between sterling and the dollar. Given that Land Rover, Range Rover and Jaguar—[Interruption.] I can do without any more interruptions. Given that Land Rover, Range Rover and Jaguar export between 50 per cent. and 60 per cent. of their production, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman make the same boast for the next two years and say that the Japanese investment in America, Europe and Britain will not mean retrenchment in the volume of production and the jobs in the British car industry?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member for Dagenham made it clear that he was pessimistic about the prospects of the Rover Group being profitable. He seemed to think that that was a temporary aberration. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) does not even want Rover Group to aim to be profitable. He dismisses the strategy set out by Graham Day which aims to enhance its profitability. He obviously contemplates volume car production regardless of profitability and joins his hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham in the most dire forecast. I am not sure whether either of the hon. Members is converted to joining the European monetary system for exchange rate stability of the sort they talk about. It would be extremely unlikely in the case of either hon. Member. However, the future of the business depends on successfully carrying through a strategy aimed at profitability and selling into a part of the market place in which the Rover Group has a realistic chance of surviving. That is what Graham Day has done.

Jaguar was a bad example. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East objected to Jaguar being privatised. Since privatisation, Jaguar's production and sales records have been broken repeatedly. It has introduced successful new models such as the XJ6 and the convertible XJS and employment has increased by 2,500. Productivity has risen threefold since the early 1980s. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it has recently opened its own engineering centre. In the face of that experience, it is no good saying that we have been through a temporary boom and that we will return to a state of decline soon. That may be what he wishes for political reasons, but it is not what is happening now.

Mr. Nellist: I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me a final question. What price is he prepared to pay for those figures from Jaguar? Does he have the same attitude as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King)? In a six-week period at the end of 1987, 17 track workers at Jaguar in Coventry died of strokes and stress-related illnesses because of the speed-up on the production line, which has since been exacerbated by Jaguar management to compensate for the worsening relationship between the dollar and sterling. Is that the price that he is prepared to pay for profit—that magical word?

Mr. Clarke: Death from a stroke or heart disease is a serious matter, so I shall not make the flippant reply that I am tempted to make. In fact, the performance of Jaguar has increased employment in the company by 2,500. I know that the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East believes that one should increase employment in manufacturing industry by getting everyone to work less —either by working shorter hours or retiring earlier or by slowing down the track so that extra workers need to be taken on.

Mr. Nellist indicated assent.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman agrees. That is not the future for British industry. It is a crazy way of trying to create jobs and we have found a better way, which is to put vehicle manufacture in private hands in thriving market conditions.

If we follow successfully the strategy upon which Graham Day has embarked—that will depend on markets and the company's performance in those markets—the company should and will prosper. It is not a strategy for contraction. High specification vehicles give more opportunity for added value by the assembler. In addition —this is extremely important for the midlands—they give more opportunities for the component suppliers which are also major employers and which, I may add, are major supporters of the proposed agreement with British Aerospace.

The Opposition's other serious concern, referred to in the motion, is the future of Rover's model range and investment. I do not propose to join the hon. Member for Dagenham in speculating about capital investment in future years. Our whole point is that Ministers should not be laying out their stall on such matters, and I shall certainly not give information relating to the nationalised company that would help Rover Group's competitors. However, if hon. Members seek reassurance about the product range and investment I can point to the facts now.

Rover has recently added to its investment in the executive sector with the launch of the new fastback range derived from the Rover 800 saloon. Rover is building on the welcome collaboration with Honda with the development of a new mid-range car, the production of which will significantly increase employment at Longbridge as Mr. Day announced two weeks ago—no doubt to the delight of all the hon. Members, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield, who have an interest in the success of the motor industry and Longbridge in particular.

Rover Group is following up its major engine investment in the 2-litre sector. As we all know, its M16 engine is an award-winning engine. It is used in the 820 range, and has just won the added distinction of being selected for the Morgan sports car. In addition, the Rover Group is developing a new high economy small engine, the K series, which will strengthen Rover Group's presence in the small car market. Those examples—I deliberately cite only information so far made public by the company—highlight the major investment programme that is under way in the Rover Group.

The tenor of the Opposition's case is to denigrate all that. They say, "It is a temporary achievement. The company has got so far only because it happens to be in public hands. Only in public hands can we achieve even temporary improvement and the outlook now is extremely gloomy and difficult." In fact, the present strategy is being backed by the proposed purchasers. British Aerospace has made public its general support for the future plans of Rover Group under Graham Day. On the information that I have, I do not expect fundamental changes in either the magnitude or the broad direction of Rover Group's investment following the change of ownership. However, those decisions on investment must be for the management of the business and the prospective new owners of the company to determine. Market changes will dictate some changes of emphasis from time to time, as they have in the past. It is precisely to give the company flexibility to respond to the market that we want it to get away from the rigidity of public ownership. We think that the industry will benefit from that.

Now that we have returned the motor industry to reasonably good health, it is most important to build upon that by setting it free from Whitehall and Westminster and removing it from the political limelight. If we possibly can, we want to avoid a return to the public sector ownership and state-directed investment that we had in the 1970s. If that was really the answer—as Opposition Members clearly believe it is—we should not now be living with the sorry fact that £2·9 billion-worth of public money, which is more than £50 for every man, woman and child in the country, has had to be put into the business since the mid-1970s. That kept the company going through the losses incurred during nationalisation until we began the process of getting the company ready to return to the private sector. We are determined to put that history behind us completely and we believe that the deal negotiated with British Aerospace gives us that opportunity.

I am not quite sure of the Opposition's view of the agreement with British Aerospace. At one point the hon. Member for Dagenham realistically accepted that the deal was likely to go ahead and that Rover is likely to be privatised. He disputed the idea that there was synergy with British Aerospace. At least he does not accuse British Aerospace of being foreign, so we have not quite gone back to the chocolates debate. What kind of company would he prefer us to be dealing with? Does he have a view on foreign car companies that might have synergy with Rover being interested in taking over the company? He claims that he is worried about the company's cash flow and the future need for capital. That rather contradicts what he says about the financial agreement with British Aerospace. Does he, or does he not, think that it is a good thing that £800 million should be used to pay off the likely indebtedness at the time of the completion of the sale? He argues that that £800 million is too much and should be reduced. That is not altogether consistent with his argument about the imminent cash-flow problems of the newly merged company and the need for a proper balance sheet for the future.

It is important—and it should be important to the Opposition—that we make it clear to the European Commission that the deal has been arrived at on a reasonable basis. I shall not go over the terms again because the debate is short and I gave a full explanation when we last discussed the matter. However, when evaluating the financial arrangements, it is important to remember two things that demonstrate the bargain from the taxpayer's point of view, as the taxpayer has had to stand all the losses in the past. First, we achieve the prospective elimination of the contingent liability represented by the Varley-Marshall assurances—£1·6 billion-worth of contingent debt that still faces the taxpayer. Secondly, we eliminate the excessive carry-over of tax losses. After the previous debate I hope that we have helped hon. Members who had difficulty in understanding that extinguishing a tax loss is a benefit to the Exchequer and not a benefit to the company, which would otherwise carry the benefit of those past tax losses.

The Government remain clear—as we were five weeks ago—that the deal should bear examination by anyone. At this stage, we think that the deal should be allowed to continue and that the Rover Group should certainly not risk damage from ill-informed public comment and speculation of the kind in which the hon. Member for Dagenham wanted me to engage. It is in the interests of the company for the agreement to be concluded and for Rover Group to go into the private sector and to continue the strategy that it has set itself, which we trust will enable it to be successful in the market place, as it has been over the past year or two.

As I said at the outset, this is the most popular and welcome of our privatisation proposals. It arouses the least controversy with the work force and, indeed, anyone else. I cannot understand how the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East can think that a large number of Rover Group's workers are hostile. To the dealers, the agreement is welcome as compared with the speculations of the past. The component suppliers welcome the agreement, as does most of the work force. The principal trade unions involved with Rover Group have made clear their fundamental wish to make the deal work, and that should be the aim of all of us now. The Labour party remains almost isolated in its completely negative attitude to the idea of returning companies to the private sector. It is very out of touch on this subject, and I believe that now that it has given us the opportunity to vote the House will support the Government's amendment.

8.10 pm

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): The Minister said that the debate was ill-timed. I appreciate that the Government are embarrassed that the Opposition have chosen to use a Supply day to debate such issues because they would like the deals to go through in stockinged feet. They do not want public accountability. They would prefer the Opposition to say nothing so that they can carry on with their little deals with various organisations.

The Minister said that he did not believe in planning. The Government often refer to the success of Japan, yet anyone who has visited that country knows that it believes in planning the economy. That has been the root of its success and is a serious problem for its competitors.

People seem to talk only about high finance, and this debate is no exception. I remind the House that behind any company are the workers. They are not simply pushing around money and exchanging pieces of paper; they are investing their lives. Any major changes in their companies affect not only them but their families. Any changes in the motor industry affect thousands of families, because it is one of Britain's most important industries.

I declare an interest, as I worked in the engineering industry throughout my life before I entered Parliament. I am a member of the AEU and secretary of the parliamentary group. A great number of our members depend on the industry for their livelihoods. It would be interesting and refreshing if, for a change, the Government showed a little more sympathy to those who create our wealth. I remind the Minister that most of the wealth in Britain has been contributed by the engineering industry —power engineering, the aircraft, shipbuilding and motor industries and numerous other industries. Engineers have paid a high price and made a great contribution to the wealth and the profits of this nation.

The Opposition are concerned not only with money but with the future of industry. The Minister's statement a few weeks ago highlighted a great lack of consultation. When making their little deals, the last people whom the Government consider are the workers. Their contempt for them is percolating through the system and there is no longer any respect for the work force or for the trade unions. Yet when the Government find themselves in difficulties, they want trade union organisers to bring sense and stability into industry.

There was no consultation about the sale of the Rover Group. The Minister said that the work force wanted it, but how does he know that? How does he know that, to a man, the work force want a takeover—[HON. MEMBERS: "Or do not want it."] Indeed. I am sure that the Opposition have more information on that than the Government have because we talk to our members.

When television interviewers take cameras to the factory gates, they ensure that they speak to two in favour and two against, so that all those watching television think that the views are equally balanced. However, the interviewers often have great difficulty finding anyone sympathetic to the Government's policy. They present a distorted view.

[Mr. Ken Eastham]

There were moves to sell Land Rover to General Motors about two years ago, but there was a public outcry and great indignation about the proposed sale. It was also feared that Austin Rover would be sold to Ford or some other foreign company. The Government finally had cold feet in the face of that public outcry, and they backed off. Since then, they have been seeking other ways to achieve their objectives.

If the company is to be sold to British Aerospace, what guarantees will there be that British Aerospace will not suddenly decide to sell it into foreign ownership? The Government will say, "It is nothing to do with us; we do not own the company; we have no influence over it; it is market forces." What the Government were seeking to achieve two years ago may well happen when the company has been privatised, and the work force is entitled to know about that.

During the past nine years it has been noticeable that the Government have never thought the producers of our wealth to be important. They glorify the buyers and the sellers who produce nothing, who simply push around pieces of paper and sell stocks and shares. It is yuppie land. The Government glorify money. They think that that can continue for ever, even though they had a shock last October when there was a sudden realisation that those pieces of paper had to be backed by production. We must manufacture goods. This country is dependent upon engineers, not people in the stock exchange pushing around pieces of paper with little thought for the future.

Thanks to the Government, this country now imports far more than it exports. That is a direct consequence of the Government's empty policy that is passed from one Minister to another. They always put off the ultimate. The future of British wealth lies in production, and investment is an important aspect of that. The Minister made snide remarks about £50 per head of investment in the industry, but he would not dare tell us how many billions has been put into farming—into food which we cannot consume and which is sold abroad, such as cheap butter to Russia. It is a rather jaundiced comparison. The Government say that the engineering industry is too expensive, but they dare not say that about keeping the farmers on their Back Benches fat. It is simply a matter of personal interest that should be exposed.

Perhaps the Minister would ask one of his staff to find out the extent of the subsidies paid to farming. I dare him to give us the figures tonight. He may smile, but I know that he dare not tell us. Perhaps he would like me to go to the Library to get the figures for him, but will he repeat them? I know that he will not. He wants only to talk about some massive subsidy to the engineering industry, yet it is only chickenfeed. We should be investing more in that industry, like our major competitors, the Japanese.

The workers are entitled to a decent deal and to full consultation. It is about time that there was less contempt for the work force and some recognition of the valuable contribution they have made and could continue to make to Britain's future wealth.

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): This debate graphically illustrates why we should get as many companies as possible out of the public sector. When Mr. Graham Day gave evidence to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry he alluded to the point that any company in the public sector—and I know that my right hon. and learned Friend will understand this comment—is lectured by Ministers and by civil servants. Here we are having a debate in the House. At the end of the day, it will not add much to the sum of knowledge as to what we should do with the company.

This debate is unfortunate, as was that in the Select Committee. The Rover company historically has been susceptible to uncertainty about its future. It is not just me who says that. In 1986, when there was speculation of a bid by Ford—and there have been a few rumours generated this evening by Opposition Front Bench spokesmen—£250 million of sales were lost and were gone for ever. The company also lost 2 per cent. of its market share and only now, two years later, is it beginning to get it back. That is exactly what we should try to avoid in debating this matter in the House—which proposition has not been accepted in the speeches made by Opposition Members thus far.

The Government could have invited bidders for the company in the same way that they have in respect of Girobank. However, that in itself would have resulted in exactly the kind of uncertainty to which I have just referred and which arose in 1986. In that regard, the advice of Mr. Graham Day, Rover's chief operating officer, was fairly crucial. If the Government had ignored his advice, that would have jeopardised the future of a great company which everyone wants to see rejuventated, and which is partly on the road to rejuvenisation. I cannot imagine that any hon. Member wants to see the status quo continued, and so we must consider the three alternatives left to the Government.

The first was acquisition by a competitor. That could have given rise to the 1986 situation, which no one in the House would want to see happen. The second was placement or flotation. There is no doubt but that that could have been possible. However, it must be remembered that Opposition Members would then have to deal with a factor which none of them mentioned: the company's accumulated historical debt would have to be written off. That was perfectly clear to the Government and would have been to any Government. The third alternative was acquisition by a non-competitor. That is what Graham Day and his board—and this was said in the Select Committee—recommended to the Government. If the men whose hands are on the tiller of the company, and who have worked wonders with it, make that recommendation, the Government would need an extremely strong argument against doing exactly that. In my judgment, the Government were perfectly correct in giving exclusive rights to British Aerospace.

Rover could operate as an independent company, but it was made clear to the Select Committee that there were a number of advantages in going in with British Aerospace. I will not indulge in a discussion about synergy; that is an argument which has been the subject of far too much hot air. If one considers the businesses within British Aerospace, there is not necessarily a great deal of synergy among some of their component activities. However, if one takes them altogether, they add strength to the total business as it is today.

I have not heard controverted the advantages described to the Select Committee. The first was that of size. Anybody who operates in the international engineering business knows that size is extremely important. We are meeting that requirement by bringing together large, multinational companies which, although they are in different businesses, and operate within different business cycles, will ultimately strengthen the overall group. I have heard nothing from the Opposition which controverts that suggestion.

Much has been said on the subject of investment. I will not say that if the company goes into the private sector, everything will be guaranteed for years hence. However, it was made very clear by Professor Roland Smith that his board accepted the five-year corporate plan. He did not evade it. That plan, as anybody who has studied this matter knows, involves investment of £1 billion over the next four of five years. Professor Smith did not evade that responsibility but clearly acknowledged it.

At the end of the day, Rover is being taken over by a British company. Of course there can be no guarantees for years hence, but as matters stand Rover is being taken over by a British company. By golly!—I can imagine the outcry there would have been from the Opposition if the Government had come forward with a takeover proposition from a foreign company. I would not have been one of those arguing in support of that proposition, but there is in the British takeover a benefit that the Opposition have not recognised.

I wish to re-emphasise a point made by my right hon. and learned Friend when he commented that the response to the proposed takeover has been positive all round, except from the Oppposition. Perhaps that is predictable because Oppositions have to oppose, and that is exactly what they are doing. That is why we should all discount what the Opposition have to say on the matter. As was said by my right hon. and learned Friend, the dealer network is extremely pleased with the proposal that has been put before it. The network employs 31,000 people, many of whom are in the constituencies of Opposition Members who are opposing the takeover. The turnover of those dealers totals a massive £4 billion plus. That is the importance of the dealer network, which is delighted with the arrangement worked out between British Aerospace and Rover.

I have also taken the trouble to speak to many of the 1,600 suppliers, who are also delighted at the arrangement. I remind the Opposition that those suppliers enjoy orders of £1·6 billion. Again, many of them may be in the constituencies of Opposition Members. I refer also to Honda, about which we have heard nothing this evening from the Opposition. Honda has a collaborative agreement with Rover, which it could have severed as a result of the takeover. Has it done so? Of course not. In the Select 'Committee, Professor Smith stated that in conversations with Mr. Kume, Honda's chairman, he said that he was delighted with the arrangement and is prepared with Rover. That shows a level of confidence in the company that is not shared by the amateurs on the Opposition Benches—although I accept that there are amateurs on the Conservative Benches as well, which is precisely why company business should be debated in board rooms rather than in the House.

I strongly believe that the taxpayer should also be delighted at the arrangement. Opposition Members have said that 2·7p per share is not much, and indeed it is not a very high price. But those of us who remember Austin Rover a year or two ago will recall that the shares were worthless: they were paper money. Opposition Members who have suggested, not here but elsewhere, that the shares have been traded on the open market at 55p to 60p —and indeed they have—should remember that the board of directors has repeatedly pointed out to shareholders that the underlying asset value did not support that price. The board went out of its way time without number to say that. Given the historical circumstances—the debt and the underlying asset value—I believe that the price is right.

I shall not blush when explaining to my constituents or anyone else that the Government are having to put a cash injection of £800 million into British Aerospace. Those who argue the proposition have conveniently forgotten about the company's accumulated historical debt. That debt is pretty massive, and the company would not have been a marketable proposition unless the Government had been prepared to cover it. This is not working capital, as has been suggested on other occasions by some Opposition Members. It is to pay off a historical debt. No other circumstances would have been possible, whichever Government had decided the future of the company and whichever disposal option had been chosen.

As my right hon. and learned Friend has mentioned, the taxpayer benefits from the £1·1 billion accumulated trading losses surrendered by British Aerospace. Who on the Opposition Benches, or anywhere else, will say that this great company is not capable of making the profits that it should make in the future? I believe that it can, because of the design and type of vehicle that it is now producing, which strikes me as what everyone wants to buy. And if the company makes profits, the taxpayer stands to save £400 million in the coming years. That too has been conveniently forgotten by the Opposition, but not by Conservative Members or, I suspect, by the taxpayer.

The Varley assurances meant a Government standing behind a company, prepared to pay for all its losses whatever the circumstances. How can Opposition Members possibly defend such a position, which allows a company—board of directors, management and work force—to care nothing about efficiency in the market place because Government and taxpayer stand guarantor to every penny that it loses? That is a heinous arrangement, and I applaud the Government's package, which ensures that such obligations will cease.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is an omission from his speech? He has not mentioned the people employed in the industry. Moreover, consultation has been negligible. The hon. Gentleman also seemed to deny the right of hon. Members to debate these matters in the House. Will he not take into consideration the fact that where public money is involved it is up to hon. Members to ensure that it is properly accounted for?

Mr. Cran: I am extremely grateful for that intervention. I concede to the hon. Gentleman that I had forgotten to mention, as I meant to at the beginning of my speech, that the one part of the motion with which I agree is the statement that "Rover Group's performance owes much to the efforts of the workforce".

With that proposition I entirely concur, and I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to say so.

[Mr. Cran]

The question of job guarantees arose during the Select Committee hearings, but Mr. Day said that no one in the market place was prepared to guarantee to buy Rover cars. That is the case with any car company, indeed any company. If there is no guarantee of purchase, there can, perforce, be no guarantee of employment. The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) may be interested to learn that Professor Smith gave the Select Committee a guarantee—and he did not do so lightly; I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows the powers of a Select Committee—that there would be no redundancies as a direct result of the merger. That does not cover the possibility that in future the public may stop buying Rover cars, but it is none the less a guarantee.

When hon. Members vote later this evening, they must not ignore what the Rover board has said. The board has said that it believes the merger to be in the interests of not only the company, the shareholders and the employees, but the creditors. Opposition Members who vote for the motion must tell us what alternative they would choose.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Keep it.

Mr. Cran: I have heard no alternatives being suggested. It is all debate and no answers.

Mr. Mitchell: Keep it!

Mr. Cran: What this arrangement gives the company is stability. For far too long, the company has been susceptible to debates of this kind in the House and to snide comments from Opposition Members and many others. What it needs now is to be left alone, like the divine Greta Garbo, to get on with the job that it has set out to do. I believe that it will do that, not only because it is Britain's biggest vehicle manufacturer but also—this too is forgotten by many—because of the £4·27 billion that it puts into not only the south and west midlands and Wales but the rest of the United Kingdom. That is another reason why it is important to ensure that the company survives.

For all those reasons, we must be very careful about the signals that we send out from the House tonight. The signals that we should send out, not only to the Community but to the EC Commission, are positive signals, showing that we believe in this proposition. If we give the opposite signal, the result will be merely a return to the uncertainty of which I have spoken, and which I cannot believe that any hon. Member wishes to see again.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): It came as something of a surprise, although a welcome one, to be congratulated by the Minister on the quality of our amendment—not least because he rather ignored some of the important points in it. He failed to explain why no alternative bidders were considered, and why the deal is being done on what Lord Bruce-Gardyne has described as "golden giveaway terms".

I desperately hope that, if the deal goes through, it is a success. There is no question about that. There is no point in hoping for failure from the Government's decisions. Having said that, there must be serious worries about whether it will do so and whether the Government have given the company the best possible chance of continuing the success which has been built up by the work force, management, and the suppliers, who have also put in hard work and sacrificed in order to achieve the turnaround that the company has itself achieved.

I agree with the Government that one of the things from which this industry has suffered, not just since Rover and its predecessors were rescued, but way before that, was Government neglect, and especially Government interference. However, one of the problems with this deal, and the basis on which it is launched, is that it shows every sign of being another Government political manoeuvre and not one of industrial logic within the industry. The Government are not looking at the needs of the Rover Group as a car manufacturer and as an industry.

The Government say that this deal is all about taking the car industry out of politics. However, the nature of the agreement which we embarked upon is essentially a political one. It is one of ideology, with the Government trying to make their own political escape from a prison which they built themselves by their commitment. The Government made it clear that their intention was to privatise the Rover Group before the next election. It was a commitment that they were unlikely to want to go back on. However, as has been made equally clear by those involved in the industry, and by the comments of the Secretary of State, there was no chance at all of a successful flotation of the Rover Group as an independent entity before the next general election. They ruled out any possibility of that.

Those involved have said that, at the very least, four to five years' profits would be needed to establish the profit record of the company were it to be successfully floated, and that takes us beyond the next general election. Therefore, the Government, whatever they might have said previously, cannot ever have had any intention of a flotation. Equally, they were not prepared to take the political flak from a sale to a foreign bidder. Thank goodness for that. That was their motive, because they had discussed it previously with Ford, but had been forced out of agreeing to that purchase by the political flak that they had run into. They could not take that option, so they had to find a British buyer if they were to stand by their commitment.

It is no wonder that, when BAe came along, the Government threw up their arms in joy, rolled over onto their back and let BAe tickle them into giving it those golden giveaway terms. That is why the Financial Times editorial on 30 March said:

"the real objection to the proposal continues to be that the bases on which the Government has chosen to negotiate appear more designed to save political face than to protect the taxpayers' interest."

That was the starting point of the entire problem. That is the first anxiety that we must address. The Government have not embarked on this matter as they claim to have done. However, perhaps they could have come up with a successful deal. It was an unusual route, but they could have come up with a deal that gives security to integrated motor manufacturing in this country, security that will ensure the success of the Rover Group.

The giveaway terms of the deal with BAe have nothing to do with industrial logic. That is not why BAe is happy about this deal. It is not synergy, but the commercial money gain that the Government are giving them. It is "monergy", not synergy, that this deal is all about. That is why BAe is so happy with the deal. I have no doubt that BAe has the best of intentions for the group. I have no doubt that it will do what it can to see that the Rover Group is a success. However, that is not why it feels that it has a good deal. It is not that it feels that it has gained the synergy in industrial logic. It is because it has made a guaranteed commercial gain. It cannot lose.

The elements of the deal clearly spell that out. BAe is to pay £150 million for 99·9 per cent. of Rover, while the Goverament give Rover's debtors £800 million in cash. Thus, £1·1 billion of Rover's tax losses will effectively be eliminated. The remaining £500 million is to be set against Rover's profits—of course, not against those of the rest of BAe. Finally, the Government eliminate for themselves their guarantee through the Varley-Marshall-Joseph parliamentary assurances on the £1·6 billion of Rover debts. That is why Lord Bruce-Gardyne described the proposal as being on "golden giveaway terms".

One only has to go back a couple of years to the debate on the possible sale of Land Rover to General Motors to see that it is a golden giveaway. At that stage, Land Rover by itself was valued at £250 million. Therefore, somewhere along the line the taxpayer appears to have made a loss. One can see that reflected in the value of 2·7p that the Government have put on the shares of the Rover Group. The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) said that the shares were priced at market value. Of course, that is the value that the market chooses to put on them. However, he also said that they had been worth nothing previously. I have looked at the history of these shares and I cannot find a time when they went down to 2·7p. They have not reached that level since the introduction of the investment programme or during the 1980s. They have been down to 15p, or 12p, but that is several times the value that the Government are prepared to put on the shares at present.

If BAe cannot lose, and if the Government feel that it cannot lose, it appears to be always at the expense of the taxpayer. However, will it be to the advantage of either Rover or British Aerospace? Again, the evidence casts doubt on that. I hope that it will be to their advantage. However, the evidence does not support the idea that this deal, in terms of the industrial success of those two companies, is giving anything like guarantees or even the best possible launch for the companies.

Again, the Financial Times editorial of 30 March 1988 rightly said:

"Past experience, especially in the British motor industry, suggests that putting together two sets of problems can simply create a new problem even greater than the sum of the problematic parts."

Considering the difficulties that both companies face, because of the nature of the industries in which they work, one has to say that that appears to be true. Against the background of the history of the British motor industry, it appears even more true. One has only to go back to the much-heralded merger between BMC and Leyland to see that all that happened was successful Leyland was brought down by transfers of cash to ailing BMC. That is a past example of Government interference causing problems. That was the Government acting for political reasons rather than on the industrial logic of the companies concerned.

By combining these different companies, we potentially jeopardise both of them. We do not know which way the scales will fall, but the likely benefits are minimal. Aircraft manufacture is based on high-cost, low-volume production, with design engineering coming to the fore, whereas car manufacture is high-volume vehicle manufacture, with high sales and production engineering. Aerospace products are marketed on the basis of long-drawn-out negotiations, often between Governments—certainly with few potential customers—while vehicles are sold continuously. In other words, vehicles are sold direct to the consumer with a mass-marketing campaign.

Of course, BAe was originally interested in Land Rover. Perhaps Rover Group sales are more like those that British Aerospace is involved in. We know, from what Graham Day has said, that he wants to take Land Rover out of the mass market, away from competing with the Japanese, and into military, governmental and similar markets.

There is no guarantee whatsoever that after five years assets will not be stripped or that the company will not be sold as a whole to a foreign bidder. In the meantime, there is nothing in what the Government have said to stop a distress sale. I cannot believe that, if the joint company gets into difficulties, the Government will say, "If you save yourself, we want the benefits of your saving yourself and to put you back into the difficulties that you were in before you sold off the Rover Group."

The truth is that, if the company gets into difficulties and feels that the best way out of them is to sell the Rover Group, there is absolutely nothing that the Government —or any Government in those circumstances—can do to stop it. Different Governments might take different attitudes to what happens on the Rover side of things, but surely they will not demand that the company goes under just for the sake of honouring agreements made now. The truth is that the guarantees are not worth the paper they are written on.

Why BAe of all companies? The Government have still not told us whether another suitable bidder emerged after the original approaches from BAe were announced in the House. We know that there were four bidders and that some were from other car manufacturers, probably foreign, but we do not know whether any British-owned company was in the bidding or whether any non-manufacturing company was in the running. We also know that, in saying what it would do with the company, BAe has not come up with any new marketing ideas or any dramatic change of direction. It has not come up with a phenomenal plan to change everything that has been happening, turn the company round, or massively increase productivity.

All that BAe has said is that it will follow the same corporate strategy that the Rover Group already has in place. This takeover adds only a political gain for the Government, not the chance of industrial benefit for the Rover Group. Confident that the EC will accept the proposals, the Government will not tell us what will happen if the company really runs into difficulties or what their view will be. If the EC throws out the proposal, will the Government just wash their hands and let the whole thing fall? That is why we are worried about it.

The Government are very fly with the figures about taxpayers' benefits, but their claim that, for an injection of £800 million—less the £150 million that BAe is paying—the Varley-Marshall-Joseph guarantees of £1·6 billion are being wiped out ignores the simple fact that the guarantees will be called in only if the Rover Group goes under; and the Government seem convinced that it will not. Moreover, if it did, assets would be realised which would have largely compensated for that, if the Government had not already chosen to sell it off to some other car manufacturer. So the Government's claims that the taxpayer has been compensated look weak.

The Government are inclined to paint this issue entirely in terms of those who are for nationalisation and those who are for privatisation. Too much of this and the previous debate have focused on that. Hon. Members should turn their minds to whether there will be an industrial long-term benefit from this particular sale, carried out in this particular way, at this great cost to taxpayers in terms of their previous investments.

Of the motions and amendments on the Order Paper, ours is the only one to consider the issue in this light. The Government's answers give us no confidence. If the deal goes ahead, I give my best wishes to all those involved —the work force, the management and the suppliers—but my confidence in their success is certainly no greater than it was before, when the company was state-run; in many respects it is less. Given that the House is unlikely to vote on our amendment tonight, I shall support the Labour motion—not for what it says about state industries, but because the self-congratulatory attitudes of the Government inspire no confidence that they have any real idea of the needs of the Rover Group or British Aerospace. That issue should be addressed by the House and by the Government.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I see six hon. Members seeking to catch my eye. This is a short debate and, unless speeches are shorter, some hon. Members will be disappointed.

8.53 pm

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): I shall do my best to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I cannot say that we were surprised to hear that the Liberal Members would support the Opposition. The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) addressed all his remarks to the Opposition. The only surprise is that he has declared so early which side of the leadership battle in his party he is on. He is obviously not after replacing the Labour party.

The hon. Member for Truro appears to misunderstand —perhaps deliberately, but perhaps by innocence—the fact that it has been the declared policy of the Rover board since the last election—not since Mr. Day, but going right back—that the company should be returned to the private sector as soon as possible. Therefore, this is no great Government machination, no great political intrigue and no great wedding to ideology. It is, in fact, freeing the company to pursue what the company's own board wants. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) made absolutely no attempt to deal with that point, nor did he say what he would do if, by some mistake, his party should have to deal with the problem. How would he tackle the company's board? Obviously he would fly in its face.

I learned of this debate with some expectation. After all, the Opposition have made such a salad of the original statement that we had to have a debate four weeks after that. They lost the argument on that occasion, so I thought that this afternoon we would get something new.

I parted company with my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he said that nothing has happened since the last debate on this issue. Well, I have some good news for him. Lots of things have happened. There has been an announcement of another 1,500 jobs at Longbridge on the R8. Sales for the first five months of this year are 6,000 ahead of any previous figure. The 800 fastback has been launched. Land Rover and Range Rover report record sales for May. In the case of Land Rover, they are the best for 11 years. Exports are the best ever. The build increased by nearly 200—that is quite an astonishing record. Production has increased on the Sherpa vans and there are plans for further increases. Exports of that vehicle have again increased. A lot has been happening.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) rose——

Mr. Miller: I am sorry, I shall not give way because time is short. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

My right hon. and learned Friend appears to have overlooked the fact that a leadership election is developing in the Labour party. Perhaps that has something to do both with the recurrence of this motion and the attitude taken by the hon. Member for Dagenham. Did we get any glasnost or perestroika? Not at all—it was back to the hard line. I noted that the hon. Member for Dagenham carefully said that there is no case for changing the present ownership. There was no mention of social ownership. The hon. Gentleman has been hauled back into line for the politics of the internal Labour party elections.

I half expected to hear that wonderful chatterer the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) talking on the water as he crossed the Humber to offer his support to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) in those elections about bringing him a successful debate on the Rover sale. Dearie me—if it were not so serious, it would be quite a comedy. I was almost anticipating "The Two Ronnies". Perhaps we would have had the revelation that Mr. Ron Todd would offer Rover the Dundee electronics plant, without commitment, as an earnest of commitment to the success of the motor industry in this country and to the updated, high-value, high-technology industry in which Opposition Members keep asking us to invest. The Opposition have not spoken about how they destroyed that investment. But, I thought, perhaps there is time for repentance. Perhaps we could have heard from the other Ronnie, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown). Incidentally, I never thought of the showers in the House of Commons as sin bins. Perhaps he had intended to offer to place orders from Afghanistan for Sherpa vans or Land Rovers for Libya to reconquer Chad. I had hoped for great things from this debate.

Mr. Roy Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller) is the joint chairman of the all-party motor industry group. I believe that his contribution to this debate is simply a disgrace and certainly out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not believe that I can rule the speech of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller) out of order, but I hope that he will have regard to what has been said and the fact that other hon. Members are seeking to speak in the debate.

Mr. Miller: I promise to be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was discussing public ownership, which is one of the main planks in the Opposition's motion.

The Opposition have also talked about a give-away, but I believe that they have given away what is going on in the Labour party and the reason for this debate. It is nonsense for the Opposition to complain about Government support for the company and at the same time to complain that the Government are not giving enough support to the company. The Opposition must make up their minds as to which way they want to go.

Finally, heeding your advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wish to discuss investment. We heard the hon. Member for Dagenham—the so-called "new wave" of the Labour party—go back to talking about throwing money at the problem. The hon. Gentleman ignored the fact that the Rover Group plan, with its investment connotations, had been accepted by British Aerospace—a point made in the powerful speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran).

The hon. Member for Dagenham appeared to go back to the days of the Ryder plan and spoke about a volume car producer, ignoring the fact that currently, unfortunately, Rover is not a volume car producer. His solution offered no prospect of the company becoming such a producer.

The hon. Member for Dagenham, never mind ignoring the lessons of the Ryder plan, suggested that a lot more investment and technology would produce results. On the last occasion that we discussed this matter, I said that there had been too great a reliance upon a strategy for technology. In that context I mentioned Professor Battachatiya, who is one of the most plausible and persuasive advocates of such a policy. He offers a technological short-cut for dealing with the problems of Rover. I am afraid that that spirit is still alive and well despite the Japanese experience. In our last debate I quoted the experience of Toyota. This week I made inquiries in Japan about Honda. That company is extremely concerned at the line that has been taken by Professor Battachatiya and his reliance on technology rather than dealing with the problems of leading, managing and co-operating with the work force. I am sure that Labour Members would agree that they are the most important ingredients for the success of a company.

I found the Opposition's case most disappointing. There was no advance, but a retreat from the glimpses of the change we have had. That is why they are the real conservative party because they are unable to meet the challenge of change. They have retreated from any suggestion of perestroika or glasnost. I am afraid that we have nothing to look forward to from the Labour party and nor has the work force. The Labour and Liberal parties expressly keep on referring to the problems. They have done everything to undermine confidence in and run down the achievements and potential of two fine British companies.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): I shall not respond to the speech of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller), who, for most of the time, indulged in a knockabout speech that dealt with personalities and made partisan points that had nothing to do with the debate. I do not intend to demean myself by following him into that gutter.

I wish to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran), which was based on his experience in the west midlands and concentrated upon the issue facing the House tonight, the gift of the Rover Group to British Aerospace. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to express concern about the effect of the present uncertainty on the prospects for the Rover Group. He was right to draw attention to the effects of that uncertainty on sales. If it continues, those sales will be greatly affected. The hon. Gentleman is wrong, however, to say that this debate is responsible for that uncertainty. This debate is the result of the Government's proposals.

The hon. Gentleman was right to say that we should let Rover Group get on with the job. I agree with him that we should leave it alone and not disturb it, and in one way I agree with him that we should not be having this debate tonight. We are having the debate only because the Government have destabilised the position. It is the Government's proposals that we are debating. They have introduced uncertainty by wanting to give Rover Group to British Aerospace. The hon. Gentleman must place the blame where it rests—on the Government.

The hon. Gentleman resented the debate for another reason—because we should not debate the future of the motor industry in general, or Rover Group in particular. I disagree with him on that point. He said that the debate should take place in the board room. We think that it should take place in public, not behind closed doors, because we are debating the future employment of thousands of people and the means of living of thousands of families. Therefore, the debate should take place in public where the public and those who work in the industry can make up their minds on the arguments expressed. I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's wish, which is shared by the Minister, to keep this private.

The Minister seemed to be equivocal and ambiguous about whether the past investment of £2·9 billion by Governments of both parties was good or bad. He seemed to regret it. I do not. That investment has saved Rover Group. Without it we would not be having this debate and the Government would not be giving Rover Group to British Aerospace. There would not have been a Rover Group. In fact, it would have gone out of existence 14 years ago if the Conservative party had had its way because it opposed the rescue, perhaps for the reason that the hon. Member for Beverley adduced—that it is for the Opposition to oppose. We would not have had this debate, a Rover Group or a British motor industry to debate, either in private or in public on that basis.

There are two crucial issues. The first relates to the strategy which is appropriate to the Rover Group. The Minister seemed to think that the Social and Liberal Democratic party agreed with him on that, but I am not sure. When I read the terms of its amendment I thought that it did, but the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), did not agree with the Government. The Minister made the Government's position clear. They want the Rover Group to have higher profits as a result of lower sales of high value cars. They want lower volume sales.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): No.

Mr. Davis: The Minister says no. I am afraid that there is another division among the Government, but I shall not pursue that.

We on the Labour Benches are united in saying that we want a Rover Group with the ambition, objective and target of higher sales. We want it to return to being a volume car manufacturer with higher sales and higher volume and more jobs. That is the crucial point.

The argument is not about whether the motor industry and Rover Group should be profitable. It is about how those profits should be earned, whether from low volume sales of high value cars or from high volume sales of cars which generate, not only high profits but more jobs. We are fearful that the Rover Group's strategy will lead to fewer jobs for our constituents, albeit with higher profits. We want higher profits from higher sales, so more jobs. When the Minister talks about going up-market he only confirms our suspicion that he is going up-market for cars and customers but down-market for jobs for our constituents.

The second crucial issue is whether Rover Group should remain in public ownership or be sold. During the previous debate we went into the terms of sale in detail. The hon. Member for Beverley did not seem to be aware of that, but we discussed the terms of the proposed sale, or the gift as we see it, in great detail. This debate has concentrated rightly on whether the Rover Group should remain in public ownership or be given away. We are clear that it should continue in public ownership. The Minister said that we had an ideological obsession with nationalisation. However, at the centre of the debate is the Government's ideological obsession with private ownership. I have not heard any justification for the Government's belief that in some way private ownership would be beneficial for this section of the motor industry which failed before under private ownership. The only reason that it was taken into public ownership was to rescue it and to allow it to survive. The Government provided the investment which was needed to save jobs.

Mr. Eastham: Does my hon. Friend recall that only a few years ago there was a serious failure in engineering at Rolls-Royce and that the Conservative Government decided in a matter of days to nationalise Rolls-Royce, otherwise there would have been no industry?

Mr. Davis: My hon. Friend is correct. I was a Member at the time and we supported the Government. I regret that only a few months afterwards the Conservative party, hell-bent on opposition, decided to vote against the salvation of the Rover Group. Tonight we see the result of that change in the Conservative approach. We are debating the ideological obsession of the Conservatives and their doctrinaire, dogmatic hostility to public ownership. They are politically hostile to the public ownership of the Rover Group precisely because it is successful.

One of the few constructive parts of the speech of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove was his reference to the recent good news from the Rover Group. Of course, that was good news from the Rover Group in public ownership. Let it be said that the 1,500 extra jobs at Longbridge are being provided by a publicly owned company. Such good news will not continue in future.

The Minister referred also to the success of Jaguar in recent years. That company is successful, again because it was saved by a Labour Government. It, too, would have closed 14 years ago—[Interruption]. In an intervention from a sedentary position the Minister has said that it was saved from Geoffrey Robinson. That is rubbish. Geoffrey Robinson was the managing director of Jaguar for a time and he helped to save the company. I give credit to him, just as I give credit to John Egan and other people who played their part, and I am sorry that the Minister chooses to make that petty, spiteful comment from a sedentary position; it demeans the Dispatch Box.

One reason why Jaguar has been more successful in recent years is that Geoffrey Robinson, among others, helped to lay the foundation of better quality cars. There was also a drastic change in the exchange rate. I am referring not to recent changes but to the decline in the pound against the dollar. That is the real secret of the success of Jaguar. It did not have anything to do with private ownership. Jaguar was successful under public ownership in the same way as the Rover Group has been successful under public ownership. The success has been the result of 14 years of hard work and investment by the taxpayer. The Government resent the success precisely because it has happened under public ownership.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was unnecessarily kind to the Minister when he said that the future was guaranteed for five years for people who work in the Rover Group. That is not correct. The Government have had a guarantee that the Rover Group will not be sold by British Aerospace within five years without the money being returned to the Government. That is not the same as saying that the jobs are guaranteed for five years.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Beverley. He said that the chairman, Graham Day, had given a guarantee to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry that the jobs would be guaranteed insofar as they could be. We understand the exigencies of the market place but the hon. Gentleman told us that British Aerospace has said that there are no plans to declare redundancies. We will put that guarantee in the bank. I hope, for the sake of my constituents, that I do not have to take it out and show it to the hon. Member for Beverley within the next five years. My information is that British Aerospace will declare redundancies in the Rover Group in the same way as that company has declared not once but several times, not hundreds but thousands of redundancies, not only among AEU members, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) referred, but among all levels of staff and employees at British Aerospace. As a result of so-called rationalisation there will almost certainly be redundancies at the Rover Group under British Aerospace.

The Minister gave the game away when he said that the Government were taking this opportunity to return the Rover Group to the private sector because of the general well-being of the economy "at the moment". He said that it was propitious to return the group to the private sector "at the moment". What happens when the moment passes and the economy runs into difficulties? What happens when it becomes more difficult to sell cars abroad because of the exchange rate? By that time the Government will be able to avoid any responsibility for redundancies or for the future of the Rover Group.

The group should remain in British public ownership. It is important for the future livelihood of my constituents and for the livelihood of thousands of people in the west midlands who depend not only on the Rover Group but on its suppliers and dealers. It is vital that that heart of the motor industry remains in existence. If it does not, other jobs will be lost. The only way in which we can give a guarantee to the people who work in the Rover Group and to the people who depend on it is to say that the group will survive. The only way it can survive is by being kept in public ownership and that is the alternative the hon. Member for Beverley asked for.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and many other Opposition Members have said that the Rover Group should remain in state ownership because it is only state ownership that has saved our car industry. We shall never know that because if instead of being brought into state or public ownership 14 years ago it had been allowed to go into liquidation it is highly possible that today we would have a motor industry of greater volume than we have at the moment.

The history of the British motor industry is of companies going out of business or being taken over by other businesses. Daimler, Singer, Standard and Wolseley come immediately to mind. They fell on hard times and went bankrupt. People picked up the pieces and made a success of them, but then they faded from the industrial scene as they were merged into bigger companies. We shall never know whether state ownership could have saved the car industry. However, we do know that, as a result of state ownership, our motor industry is nothing like as big as it was. It has been reduced and it is only by separating the units and by privatising companies such as Jaguar that future success and prosperity can be guaranteed. There are now more people working for Jaguar than worked for it when it was state-owned and included companies such as Alvis and Self-Changing Gears. Jaguar is successful and it has maintained that success and built on it because it knows that if it does not succeed it will go out of business and there will be nobody to provide a blank cheque.

The Rover Group wants to be privatised to get out from underneath the state company. I know that because I live among the work force, as does my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller). We live and work among the people of Birmingham and we know that they are sick and tired of being the subject of public debate year in and year out. They are subjected to that by the Opposition who are anxious to point the finger and say that Rover is a failing company. They try to run it down and to do a hatchet job on it, and that is what they have been trying to do in this debate.

The Opposition talk about the survival of the business, say that it cannot provide the investment and that it will go out of business. They are saying that at a time when the group is fighting for all the sales and registrations that it can get in August. The Opposition are anxious to convey the message to the public not to buy Rover cars because they can have no faith or confidence in the company and that it will go out of business as a result of what the company—not the Government—wants to do. It is not the Government who are seeking to privatise the business. The managing director and the chief executive of Rover and British Aerospace got together and said that they have some degree of rapport because they are both in highly technical engineering.

Britain has many companies making all kinds of things and with all sorts of subsidiaries. Vickers is a classic case. It makes Rolls-Royce cars and lithographic plates. There is no direct synergy between the companies but the same disciplines, corporate investment, opportunities and facilities are at head office for use by all the subsidiary companies. I am confident that under the new arrangement the Rover Group in partnership with British Aerospace will prosper.

Of course there is a cost element involved, but there is absolutely no doubt that the Rover Group could maintain its present financial position as a state company. Somewhere along the line the debts have to be written off and the Government have to restructure the company financially. By assisting in its restructuring and allowing it to go into the private sector, they are getting a remarkably good deal for the country and for the company.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who represents a Ford constituency, made great play about lack of investment in the Rover Group if it goes into private hands. He said that it will be knocked apart by exhaust emission controls and has no hope of being able to surmount that. That is an insult to the engineers and to the company. Of course it can surmount that. New engines and new cars are on the way. It already has new engines running, and of course it sells cars to the United States of America where exhaust emissions are of paramount importance.

It is a fallacious argument and a wicked one to boot. It says that if Rover fails we shall become a branch line in engineering. Obviously, the hon. Member has no idea at all about engineering in the motor industry today, because Rover Group is in partnership with Honda in gearbox assembly and the use of engines. It is in partnership with Volkswagen over gearboxes and it will soon be in partnership with PSA/Peugot-Citroen for the manufacture of gearboxes. That is the name of the game in the British motor industry and in the world car industry. For years the Rover Group has been buying automatic gearboxes from General Motors, and from Carysler before then, for certain up-market cars. That is the name of the game. It is not branch-line engineering; it is making the best use of the available products in the market place and that is as it should be.

I have spoken to the work force and I know that the workers look forward to the new arrangement because it solves the problem that they know the company has to address. Will it find its future in the state sector where it becomes a subject of public debate and abuse, or can it get into the private sector, free from the shackles of Government controls, constraints, debates and interference and be allowed to prosper on its own? Having spoken to many of the employees in Birmingham, and I am sure that the same could be said for those in Cowley, I have absolutely no doubt that they know that their future lies in the private sector and they have but one thing to say to the Labour Opposition, and to those who insist on debating the future of the company, and that is, "Lay off it."

Mr. John Hughes (Coventry, North-East): I have listened to many speeches tonight, and I have little affinity with them, especially with those of the Bernard Mannings on the Conservative Benches who treat this very important subject and people's jobs in a jocular manner.

I have listened to the statisticians in the debate. That was an unexpected ploy from the Government Benches, but it bears little resemblance to the physical realities of people. The British people know that Rolls-Royce, British Telecom, BP, British Gas—and Rover, if it happens—have been stolen from them. They have lost out in those deals in an inhumane way. The revenue from those companies which originally went to the Treasury bought hip joints for the elderly, provided dialysis machines for renal cases, provided wheelchairs for the disabled and operations for cardiac patients in the Birmingham children's hospital. That is what the revenue from British Leyland meant, and you ignore that.

Mr. Speaker: Order—not me.

Mr. Hughes: It would have continued to meet that very humane need but for the obscene greed of the Government which has diverted revenue from humane needs into the well-lined pockets of the shareholders. In the case of Jaguar, 50 per cent. of the shareholders are American.

Anyone who has been employed in the car industry must view the Government's latest proposals with deep apprehension. They have suffered horrendously from the Government's strategies. Government appointees—so-called experts—had a brief to make Leyland as competitive as the Japanese manufacturers. The product of their pruning and slashing is the equivalent of a Japanese bonsai tree. It is stunted and fragmented. Indeed, the industry is so small that only the sweat and skill of the workers have prevented it from going to the wall.

I have experienced the effects of these industrial entrepreuneurs. Morris Engines, where I worked, provided homes, and clothed and fed families. It was reduced to rubble by Government appointees. Coventry car manufacturers, who were of world repute, were wiped off the map. Coventry was blighted, and it has yet to recover. That is what threatens workers who will be affected by these proposals.

I can only hope that the European Commission will not permit the merger. If the deal is permitted, I can only say that, if it were made outside the House, it would put the perpetrators in gaol. It is the result of connivance by a Government who lack humanity and refuse to fund the Birmingham children's hospital adequately. They are prepared to jeopardise the lives of children who suffer from major cardiac complaints. You should be standing up and talking about the child who has died in your constituency because you have argued for revenue——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he must put his speech in the third person.

Mr. Hughes: Revenue from the company will be handed over dishonestly to shareholders. It will line the pockets of shareholders of British Aerospace if the privatisation goes ahead.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood): I represent a primarily British Aerospace constituency, but I was astonished by what the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said. I have listened to him in Committee for many hours, and it was unfortunate that his speech tonight in no way matched speeches that I have heard him make on many other occasions.

I have rarely listened to so much criticism, complaint and denigration of the prospects for British industry. Everything that has gone wrong he blamed on the Government and on private industry; everything that has gone right has been claimed as a success either of public financing or of a change in the exchange rate. I find that amazing. The hon. Gentleman made not one reference to the achievements of the Rover Group or of British Aerospace. All we heard about was failure, failure, failure.

I was fascinated, but not surprised of course, to hear no reference to the debate on 11 March 1987 about Leyland—DAF and the general state of what was then the Austin Rover Group. It was all doom, gloom and despondency. We were told that Leyland Trucks would disappear. What has happened? The latest figures show that Leyland Trucks' sales have increased because it has had access to the dealer network throughout Europe provided by DAF. That is precisely what Conservative Members said 15 months ago, especially my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry, who was then on the Back Benches. We heard constant carping about the state of British Aerospace and its capacity to cope with the intake of a major motor manufacturer. British Aerospace faces difficulties with airframe manufacture and the exchange rate is causing further difficulties. Opposition Members fail to recognise that two years ago the exchange rate, instead of being £3·10p to the deutschmark, was £4 to the deutschmark. It has increased and decreased, and somebody must say whether that benefits the aerospace and motor industries.

Rationalisation in the aerospace and motor industries has cost jobs. It has not cost 1,100 redundancies at Filton, as the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) suggested. I should know because I represent the area; he does not.

We are debating the proposed merger between British Aerospace and the Rover Group. Significantly, we have not heard one serious alternative proposal from the Opposition. The hon. Member for Dagenham referred over and over again to an indigenous motor manufacturer. Is it indigenous with a link with Honda? If it is to be purely indigenous, would the hon. Gentleman drop the link with Honda or would he extend it and allow it to operate?

If the Opposition are saying that the merger with British Aerospace should not go ahead, they must say what they would do with the Rover Group. I was surprised that, in denigrating the two companies, no Opposition Member referred to the massive funding given to Renault. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East suggested that the European Community should refuse to allow the merger to take place. What is the alternative? Is it merely to pour in more money? The amount involved in the merger is insignificant compared to the amount given to Renault. The deal is good for both companies, and it is about time that the matter was resolved, cleared off the decks and both companies became one.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): The hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) needs to learn the important difference between a link and complete absorption. The Labour party recognises and values more than anyone else the importance of the link with Honda. If British Aerospace had something to add, and it may have something to add, there would be no reason why a link should not be established. Complete takeover is a different matter.

The takeover is clearly motivated by the Government's pathological hatred of the public sector and, I suspect, by the fact that they will not recognise the importance of the public-sector contribution to the many achievements that the Minister rightly mentioned earlier.

The critical question for the future is from where the capital will come. It is no good saying that undertakings have been given, that money may be available from British Aerospace or that the takeover will depend simply on the market. What we are being offered depends not only on the car market—to which the Rover Group's work force and all the other companies involved have been gearing their efforts—but on the aviation market, which is very uncertain. We have not been given any guarantees that capital investment will be made available in the future, which is the major worry that the workers at Cowley have expressed to me in recent months. I agree wholeheartedly with one comment that was made by the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller). He said that a lesson that must be learnt from the Japanese is how to co-operate with and motivate the work force.

The best signal that could be given to the public and Rover Group's work force—especially at Cowley, where my constituency responsibility lies—is an announcement about the forthcoming model range. The lack of a new model for Cowley is of major concern. I shall not rest until I have been given undertakings that the future of the work force will be secured.

A question has to be put to the Government. If the deal goes ahead and they have shrugged off their responsibility and washed their hands of this vital strategic industry, what happens if it goes wrong?

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): This debate has been a fascinating exercise; it has made me realise that, having failed the viva we gave the Government on 4 May, all the opportunities for revision, all the hard work done by Central Office and all the advice of the Civil Service have not produced in tonight's re-examination any better arguments than they had before. Essentially, the Government's only argument throughout the debate, which has been echoed by every Conservative Member who has spoken, is, private good, public bad; private good, public bad. They have chanted that like Orwell's pigs as if it was the key to economic regeneration.

It has been a sad spectacle watching hon. Members whose constituencies are affected by the exercise having to whistle in the wind because they do not have the guts to speak up for jobs, the integrity of the industry, investment or the new models and because they do not have the intelligence to see what is happening to the industry and what is implicit in the deal. All they have been able to do is reiterate the chant. Greater love hath no man than that he lay down his constituency and his industry for his leader's prejudices. It certainly helps in that process if one does not understand what is going on. We shall see the consequences of that.

As our motion states, no good will come of the merger. It has no logic. It helps neither company and contains the danger that it could harm both. That is a real probability. The Government, with no higher wisdom than to get rid of public assets—the Lady Macbeth syndrome: "Out, damned spot", or "Out, damned Rover"—are washing their hands of their responsibilities in an attempt to get rid of Rover at this opportunity.

Every country faced with a crisis in its car industry has seen the centrality of that industry to manufacturing, the balance of payments, employment and technology in that country. It does not involve just electronics but ceramics and plastics. Every country has intervened to save its threatened car industry. Even in the United States, the Government intervened to save Chrysler. That is the Government's responsibility. That has happened in this country too. Several countries are still supporting their car industries generously—Spain, France and Italy and, to a limited extent, West Germany.

The important point is not the endless argument between privatisation and nationalisation but the support necessary to build the industry up into a state in which it could survive on its own feet if it was Government policy that it should do so. The strength of the industry is the crucial factor, not the doctrinaire arguments about public or private ownership.

Rover cannot stand on its own two feet as an independent producer. It is still trapped in its central dilemma. It is too small to be a volume car producer, but it is not yet sufficiently well invested to be the quality up-market producer we would like it to be. A production total of just over 400,000 a year is not adequate to generate the investment or the new models. It is not a firm enough base to generate the profits that would allow the company to survive.

A previous top executive of Rover, Ray Horrocks, said in 1986 that to survive and to generate profits sufficient to make the investment self-sustaining Rover needed an output of 600,000 vehicles a year: in other words, a third higher than the present output. That is what it needs to survive. The Government's responsibility is to keep supporting and helping Rover and to keep it in the state stable until it achieves that figure. Then we can talk of its being viable. Then we can talk about returning it to the private sector, if that is the Government's doctrine. Until then, Rover cannot survive on its own. That is the crucial factor.

Ministers have not told us how a company that is now surviving and investing in new models only because it is in the state sector will manage on its own in the long term. Putting it into the stable with British Aerospace is effectively much the same as putting it out on its own. It needs a scale of production that it does not have. Until the company has that scale, the state has no alternative but to keep it. Endless questions have been asked about Labour's alternative. Our alternative is to keep Rover Group where it is, to build it up and invest in it and to produce the new models that will allow it to survive. That is the only sensible strategy, and that is the strategy we advocate.

The Government have prevaricated, chopped and changed and wombled and wandered all over the place alternating their policies. For a period, we have had the Graham Day treatment. If I am not well disposed to Graham Day, it is not only because he has dropped the name Austin. He has inflicted the anorexia nervosa treatment on Rover. He has constantly gone for profits and financial return rather than scale, investment and building up the company. That is the crucial thing. He has shed functions and services. He has shed Unipart, Bos, trucks, Llanelli Radiators, Beans Foundry and Leyland CVT—all functions that a car industry needs for integrated production. They have all been chopped off one by one in the desire to pretty up the profits and get the company back into the private sector as quickly as possible to raise money. In other words, Rover Group has shed everything that it needs in its association with British Aerospace.

Now the Government have gone in for another zig-zag phase. A previous zig-zag was to flirt with sale to competitors. Frankly, that would have brought in more money for the taxpayer, if that is what the Minister thinks is important. A competitor would undoubtedly have spent more to run it down——

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): Is it not the case that the Government would have preferred to sell on the open market—if necessary to the Japanese—but that the Secretary of State for Wales, who represents Worcester, and the Secretary of State for Employment, who represents Sutton Coldfield, knew the political consequences of selling to a car competitor from abroad and used the interim period to sell the company to British Aerospace so that that company can sell it in five years' time? No guarantee has been given to the Select Committee on Trade and Industry that that will not happen.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is extremely well informed on these issues, from his work on the Select Committee. That scenario is quite likely. Perhaps the Government are postponing the evil day. They were rightly stopped from pursuing that strategy. They could not carry out the only test of a company's ability to survive: they could not float the company, because they knew it would sink. The genuine way of privatising the company is not to lean it on another company but to float it off as an independent company.

Why did the Government not do that? If the company is ripe for privatisation, why not keep it going until it has the necessary scale and then float it? They did not do that, but they were desperate to give it the Lady Macbeth treatment. I am reminded of a joke from "Beyond the Fringe": what we need at this stage of the war is a futile gesture. The Government have found the futile gesture. They can get rid of it. It is the wind of opportunity; something that fell off the back of the devaluation expansion from 1986—the improvement in the fortunes of the company.

The Government were in a dilemma. Enter at that moment—not with a "Shazam!"; not from Krypton but from Harrods—Captain Britain, that industrial Toby jug, Professor Smith, who is not, it has to be said, as daft as he looks. He wants a good price for taking the company off the Government's hands. He has nothing to offer. British Aerospace has nothing much to offer except casual conversations between engineers. There is no synergy. Frankly, there would be more synergy if Rover merged with the manufacturers of dangling dice for the back window or plastic car upholstery.

British Aerospace works on a long-term investment strategy and it takes 15 years for its investment runs to come home. To sustain it now it needs a cash cow, something like an insurance company or, perhaps, Harrods. Instead, it is being offered Rover because it is clear that, for the next two years, Rover will boost its earnings per share. Phillips and Drew estimate that earnings per share will jump to 62p this year and 96p next year, as against 48p per share without the merger. It is all about giving British Aerospace survivability and the earnings that it cannot get from the cash cow that it should have had. All that British Aerospace has given in return is a guarantee that will last for only five years, with the possible consequences that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) rightly mentioned. It is nothing more than a short-term measure.

As my hon. Friend asked, what happens if the European Commission deems that the Government's contribution to the merger is too great? The Select Committee asked Professor Smith whether it would affect his willingness to purchase if that contribution was cut. He said, "Quite dramatically." In other words, it will all be up for grabs again. That is the danger, and the Government have given no guarantee of what might happen then.

Both companies are vulnerable in the same way. They do not supplement each other; they simply amplify each other's weakness. Both are vulnerable to a rising exchange rate that is threatening British manufacturing once again. It does not matter which aspect of Government exchange rate policy we consider, whether it be the Prime Minister's or the Chancellor's—the one is only slightly dafter than the other—or a combination of those policies: the pound is now too high for the health of manufacturing. What is more, the Government are refusing to allow the free market, which they praise in every other respect, to operate on the pound. Why not let the free market operate on the pound, bring down interest rates and bring down the pound with that? Industry must bear the double burden of an over-valued pound supported by interest rates that are far too high.

Our real exchange rate against the deutschmark is up 16 per cent. on 1987 and up 40 per cent. on the last quarter of 1976. That is what will strangle British manufacturing industry. The Government cannot blame pay increases, because labour costs increased only slightly last year because of expansion. The Chancellor has discovered a secret—expand the economy and labour costs come down. Now, because production is falling, labour costs will increase again.

The terms of trade for manufacture now stand at 107, so they are worse than the 105 at which they stood in the first quarter of 1981. Everybody knows that the exchange rate then was disastrously high, with ruinous consequences for British industry. It is now worse. We are heading for a position in which both British Aerospace—especially its commercial planes and the Airbus contract—and Rover will be vulnerable. Our exports will be down and our imports up. Jaguar's exports to the United States are down 20 per cent. in the first quarter of this year, and the imported share of the British car market will increase to more than 50 per cent. this year. A repetition of the disaster of 1979-81 will result from over-valuation of the pound.

When both companies are weak in the same areas, they are not helped by being shackled together. They compound each other's problems. Whence will come the investment for new models? The Government have given no answer to that, yet new models are crucial if the company is to continue. All this has happened because the Government want a quick fix. There are no guarantees about redundancies, plants or new models. There is no provision for investment, and no provision for the future.

That is the economics of irresponsibility. The Government have betrayed the British car industry, which has seen a bigger rundown than has occurred in any other country since 1979. There has also been a bigger increase in imported cars than in any other country since 1979, and now Rover is about to be betrayed.

The danger is that a company in that situation will not survive but will have to be brought back into the state stable by a Labour Government as a central part of the expansion of manufacturing industry, because this Government, irresponsibly, made no provision for its future. That is the betrayal which a Labour Government will reverse.

9.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): There have been four debates on this subject and at long last the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has admitted that if—God forbid—the Labour party ever returns to government it will renationalise a privatised Rover Group. At last we have that on the record. We have been trying for some time to get that response and now we have it—and we shall not forget it.

It is inevitable that in the course of my remarks this evening I shall repeat myself, as on the three previous occasions—31 March, 4 May and 12 May—when the House considered this matter at considerable length all the points raised tonight by Opposition Members were discussed. Nothing has changed and we have nothing further to report in relation to progress in our discussions with the EC.

It is a measure of the lack of the Opposition's originality that they cannot find anything else to talk about except to repeat themselves. I was warned by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), in one of his Adjournment debates, that the chairman of the parliamentary Labour party was pressurised by him into having a further debate on which the Opposition could vote. He told me so, and he speaks with some authority on motor industry matters, as he frequently reminds us. Therefore, the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) had to do what he was told. That is why we are where we are today.

I remind the House again of my constituency involvement with British Aerospace, Leyland-DAF and Leyland Bus with the town whose name was once given to the company we are discussing today. That involvement has enabled me to see—contrary to the jibes of some Opposition Members, to the effect that many of my hon. Friends and myself do not pay attention to those working in the industry—the logical development that is represented——

Mr. Gould: The Minister has nothing to say.

Mr. Atkins: Opposition Members have chosen today for their debate. They have spoken at length, and on the basis of a lack of information. The least that they can do is to listen to the Government's response—albeit for the fourth time—because they do not have anything original to talk about.

In the short time left to me, I remind the House that we discussed this matter at considerable length on the Floor of the House and in the Select Committee.

Mr. Gould: He has nothing new to say.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Gentleman is right; we have nothing further to add to what was said in the previous debates which the Labour party initiated. We have reminded the Opposition yet again that that is the case. It is not my fault that I am here answering the debate—it is the fault of the Opposition, because they chose this day to repeat themselves ad nauseam.

Mr. Ashton rose

Mr. Atkins: No, I am not giving way. If the hon. Gentleman has something to say, he can write it up in his article for The Star and we shall all read it with great interest.

Mr. Ashton rose——

Mr. Atkins: Go on, then.

Mr. Ashton: Is the Minister aware that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry has discussed the matter at length for many hours? It is apparent that the Government are stalling and refusing to reply to any debate until August because they do not want to respond to the Common Market point.

Mr. Atkins: I assure the House that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has told me that he will be on holiday in August, and I shall certainly be. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman will be as well. On that basis, nothing of such importance is likely to happen.

From my knowledge of my area and from talking to people working in the industry, particularly the component manufacturers and a number of the dealers who have written to us, I am satisfied that the deal will be extremely good news for my constituents, and those of many other hon. Members on both sides of the House. Having talked and listened to them, I know that they want to stay within a British company, and that is what British Aerospace is—a company that has dedicated and devoted itself to doing great things in the export as well as the domestic market. I believe that their interests, and those of constituents of other hon. Members, will be protected by a speedy implementation of the terms of this conditional agreement.

Do the Opposition really want to return to the days when Leyland was a music-hall joke, the butt of every cheapskate comedian? Do they want to return to the days when morale was at rock bottom, and many employees —my constituents, working orginally for Leyland Motors and before that for Spurriers—resented the dreadful image created under their management? Do they not recognise the achievements of the present management in rebuilding the company in co-operation with the work force—a management that wants the company to be returned to the private sector? Need I quote Graham Day yet again? His classic comment was:

"For me it is not simply a matter of ideology, it is a matter of very good common business sense".

I want to draw particular attention to some of the speeches that have been made. My hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) made an excellent speech, as many hon. Members on both sides of the House will have recognised. He speaks as a knowledgeable former director of the CBI who understands industry. He is also a member of the Select Committee which, as he rightly said —as did the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) —considered the matter. He is right in his assessment that the continuous spotlight on the company is not necessarily doing it all the good that it should do. My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Miller) speaks with considerable authority, because he knows what is going on—backed by my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), who is prevented from contributing to the debate but whose advice we find invaluable in the Department, and without whom we could not make the decisions that we make.

There were jibes from Opposition Members that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) has never made so much as a mousetrap. Yet he was an engineer working for the British Motor Corporation, and he has set up a company that supplies components to the motor industry. He knows what he is talking about, unlike Opposition Members, and the sooner they realise that the better.

That is the point. Conservative Members, speaking about constituencies where they live and understanding what the work force has to say, speak with authority. Opposition Members are in the desperate straits of old-fashioned Victorian Socialism. All that they believe in is nationalisation at all costs, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, that master mixer of metaphors, has given a commitment to renationalise the company if and when Labour ever come into office.

We have made it clear that we believe that this is a good agreement, good for the company and good for the taxpayer. We believe that it will again demonstrate the benefits of privatisation, enabling a business to develop in response to the market, not Whitehall or Westminster. We believe that Rover Group will benefit from shaking off once and for all the perceptions associated with more than a decade of state ownership. The agreement with British Aerospace offers the prospect of a new future and a new period of stability for Rover Group, removed from the spotlight of political controversy. It is a good deal and we should support it.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that the recent improvement in Rover Group's performance owes much to the efforts of the workforce and management combined, that further improvement can best be achieved by returning the business to full private ownership, that the proposed takeover by British Aerospace is to be warmly welcomed and is in the interests of Rover Group's employees as well as those of its suppliers and dealer network, that future investment should be a matter for the management of the business and the prospective new owners, and that the overall terms of the sale agreement are in the interests not only of the companies but also of the taxpayer.

Goods Vehicles

Mr. Speaker: Before I call upon the Minister to move the motion, I must call the attention of the House to a misprint on the Order Paper in line 6 of the motion. After the word "suppression" the words

"so as to make its application, like the proposed Directive on"

should be inserted.

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8284/87 on spray suppression devices and lateral protection (sideguards) for certain categories of motor vehicles and their trailers; and endorses the Government's objectives of securing Community arrangements which would not require more stringent standards than those required in the United Kingdom at present, and amendment of the proposed Directive on spray suppression so as to make its application, like the proposed Directive on sideguards, permissive rather than mandatory, and restricted in scope to the same categories of vehicles as are covered by the existing United Kingdom Regulations.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) for pointing out that some words had been omitted from the motion.

Today we are to consider two proposals from the Commission. They were issued by the Commission in September last year. Both proposals are for directives for heavy lorries and their trailers, one for spray suppression devices and the other for lateral protection devices or sideguards. The proposals are for a mandatory directive for spray suppression devices and a permissive directive for sideguards. Both invoke article 100 as their legal basis. They would both have a dual role of making progress and improving safety and avoiding the possibility of member states erecting barriers to trade by applying unique national standards.

In the negotiations in Brussels the measure on spray suppression devices has aroused considerable opposition from some member states. It is unlikely that it will be adopted in the foreseeable future. There is likely to be agreement that the proposal for sideguards should be amended to correspond with the Economic Commission for Europe regulation. All member states are likely to find such an amendment acceptable.

Although at present there seems little prospect of a common position being adopted by the Council, there is a possibility that as the current presidency draws to a close it will try to achieve a common position to add to its tally of successes. We have recently been advised that such an attempt could be made this month. In our negotiations in Brussels these two proposals have been dealt with together. They are separate in their subject matter.

The sideguard proposal sets standards for the design and construction of lateral protection to be fitted to heavy goods vehicles and their trailers over 3·5 tonnes maximum gross vehicle weight. The guards cover the open space in front of the rear wheels and are intended to prevent pedestrians and cyclists from falling under the side of the vehicle and being run over by the rear wheels.

We have had requirements in regulations for sideguards in the United Kingdom since 1983. France and Holland also have similar requirements for them on some categories of heavy vehicle. To achieve harmonisation of requirements throughout Europe, discussions have been held in Geneva and an ECE regulation has been prepared.

This contains, for heavy vehicles over 12 tonnes and trailers over 10 tonnes maximum weight, requirements for flat sideguard rails similar to those in our present construction and use regulations. For vehicles from 3·5 tonnes to 12 tonnes the ECE regulation allows round bars, as specified in the French regulations, instead of flat rails. In our view, the round bars proposed for smaller goods vehicles offer slightly less protection than the flat rails which the current United Kingdom regulations require. A concession on that point was necessary to reach European agreement for flat rails to be part of the standard in the ECE regulation applicable to the heavier goods vehicles and trailers which predominate in international traffic. Such an agreement is in our interests as it paves the way for international haulage vehicles from Europe being fitted with sideguards similar to those required for United Kingdom registered vehicles.

All member states were party to the discussions in the United Nations ECE. In the negotiations in Brussels there was agreement among member states that the Commission proposal for sideguards should be slightly amended to align with the ECE regulation. There are signs that the Commission will propose such an amendment. It has not yet done so. If it does, it will be in the United Kingdom interest to support the sideguard proposal as it would then align more closely with the present United Kingdom requirements.

There are two implications for vehicles operating in the United Kingdom, be they purely national or international operations. It would be a continued requirement for operators or manufacturers of trucks over 12 tonnes and trailers over 10 tonnes to fit the more robust flat rail sideguards. However, for lighter vehicles they would have the option of fitting the rounded sideguards on very much the established self-certification basis. If they chose to fit the sideguards to meet the requirements of the directive, they would need type approval. In effect, I envisage maintenance of the status quo on this provision.

In addition, international transport operators, that is, those registered in the United Kingdom and in those member states that adopt the directive, will now have to fit sideguards. Gone will be the opportunity to dodge United Kingdom law by registering as an international operator.

I will now turn to the question of spray suppression devices, the second of the Commission proposals which we are to consider. Since 1986 the United Kingdom has been the only country to have requirements in regulations for the design and construction of spray suppression devices. These have been required to be fitted only to new heavy goods vehicles and trailers over 12 tonnes and 3·5 tonnes maximum gross weight respectively and to trailers with two or more axles already in service over 16 tonnes maximum gross weight.

The technical contents now contained in the Commission's proposals are based on and are similar to the present United Kingdom requirements for spray suppression devices.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Like my hon. Friends and Opposition Members, I have had quite a lot of experience of driving along motorways. I have often done so in a typical English summer when it is pouring with rain and there is about an inch of rain in five hours. Hon. Members will have noticed, to their dismay and distress, lorry overtaking lorry under these conditions. They will themselves have attempted to pass the second lorry in the overtaking lane when that lorry was going at about 70 mph. There is no visibility. One cannot see. One is going through a mist and is putting one's life in the hands of the Almighty. It is incredibly dangerous. That is happening under the regulations which my hon. Friend says we already have in the United Kingdom and which we are asking the Europeans to bless and agree with.

My hon. Friend is normally robust on the subject of road safety. Cannot he come forward with a proper system so that the motoring public is not put at risk by the maniac juggernaut drivers who travel at speeds which are too fast when the roads are awash with water? It is devastatingly dangerous.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend makes his point with vigour. If I had my way, and if we were debating my prejudices rather than the draft directive of the European Commission, I would put forward a proposal that any lorry which did not have effective spray suppression would be allowed to travel at only 50 mph if its windscreen wipers were on. But I have not yet managed to convince my officials or the European Commission about that. My hon. Friend has made the sort of point which has often been made to me by my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller), who will probably want to speak.

I return to the technical contents of the Commission's proposals which are based on or are similar to the present United Kingdom requirements for spray suppression devices. Although they are similar, there are a small number of differences where the technical content in the Commission's proposals departs from the technical characteristics of our regulations, particularly in the positioning of the mudflaps more closely behind the tyre which may result in them being damaged more easily than with the United Kingdom requirements, without them necessarily being more effective in reducing spray. These points of difference in the detail of the technical content have been discussed in negotiations in Brussels but would need to be resolved much more closely to our requirements before they are likely to be acceptable to the United Kingdom.

As I outlined earlier, the United Kingdom has taken the lead on spray suppression devices; that news will be welcome to my hon. Friends. The United Kingdom is the only country to have such requirements. For retrospective fitment the United Kingdom requirements apply only to trailers over 16 tonnes maximum gross vehicle weight with two or more axles. Although there were only 140,000 of these, we allowed three years for the retrospective fitting of these devices on these vehicles.

As proposed in article 9, the directive brings the weight down to 3·5 tonnes maximum gross vehicle weight and makes it applicable to all goods vehicles and trailers above that weight, both new and in service. This will considerably increase the number of goods vehicles, by about 430,000, which would have to be retrospectively fitted with these devices. This would be a mammoth task three times greater than previously experienced in the retrofit programme on heavy trailers. From our experience, it is clear that the Commission's deadline of 1989 for the completion of its proposed retrospective fitment could not be met. Such a programme would take years and it is estimated that it would cost about £40 million.

The United Kingdom Government are not in favour of compulsory retrospective fitment of anti-spray devices to all goods vehicles from 3·5 tonnes upwards. Heavy trailers of four or five-axle articulated vehicles are already required to be fitted with these devices. These constitute 40 per cent. of motorway goods vehicle traffic. Their size, speed and generally poor aerodynamics and weight result in them being significant spray propagators, much more so than the relatively light, potentially more sleek and better mud-guarded lighter goods vehicles. Their length makes overtaking in spray particularly hazardous, but that is not the case with smaller vehicles. It is on motorways that speeds are highest and the spray worst.

Other types of vehicle such as rigid lorries and tractor units on the roads now have reasonable mudguards, and so a retrospective programme would offer minimal spray nuisance reduction and would not be cost effective. Application to new heavy vehicles is relatively simple and cost effective. In general, we get good value from the fitting of these devices to vehicles that have high motorway mileage. This is not the case for lorries below 12 tonnes gross. These smaller vehicles generally do not generate spray to the same extent as the heavier ones with greater number of axles and, in addition, they are most generally used on ordinary roads where spray is much less of a problem than on motorways.

The type and condition of roads, speed limits and climatic conditions can all affect spray. These vary considerably across the Community. It is likely that each member state will want to select the categories of vehicles to which these devices should be fitted to suit the particular operating conditions in each country—if they wish to fit them at all. It would be difficult to include all these variations under a mandatory structure. A permissive directive would allow such a flexible approach. In negotiations in Brussels no member state was able to support the Commission's proposals for the directive to be mandatory. Adoption in its present form is unlikely to achieve common agreement. For the reasons I have outlined, we shall be arguing strongly against the retrospective aspects of the directive other than for heavy trailers. We shall support other member states in their rejection of mandatory provisions.

The Government would support amendments to the proposed anti-spray directive to make its application permissive and to restrict its application to the same vehicles as those covered by the existing United Kingdom requirements Our record in both these areas is one of trying to promote sensible advances in improved safety benefits within technically and economically realistic limits.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Can the Minister enlighten the House about the exact meaning of "a permissive directive"?

Mr. Bottomley: A permissive directive allows member states to make requirements of their national operators.

Anti-spray devices and sideguards improve the safety of heavy goods vehicles. International directives will ensure that United Kingdom operators, whether engaged in national or international transport, will be required to fit the devices. A permissive directive on spray will give the best chance of a directive being promulgated. The motion promotes the best interests of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I relished the moment of rare candour when we saw what might be described in unparliamentary terms as the real Peter Bottomley inside the Minister. I am rather intrigued by this concept of the separation of power and responsibility. There is the responsible man and the powerless Minister. As the Minister knows, I have some respect for his qualities. He speaks well about road safety but clearly he is so shackled by the culture and inheritance of his Department that the problems begin at that point.

As the debate is about the manner in which the European Community is approaching the safety of heavy goods vehicles and about the manner in which the Department of Transport is approaching such vehicles, it might be worth refreshing hon. Members' memories about the comments made in the 18th report of the Public Accounts Committee published in February. On the regulation of heavy lorries it said:

"Throughout our examination we were very concerned about the long delays by DTp in addressing fundamental issues about the effects of heavy lorries and a lack of urgency in promoting essential research."

Unfortunately, that charge is well made and difficult for the Department to describe as unfair.

Although the Minister tells us that the British Government were the first, and the only Government so far, to adopt spray suppression measures, those measures were hastily adopted and showed signs of being a political response to a problem about which the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) made the usual comment of the motorist. In reality, inadequate research had been done on that basis. The Government's White Paper in response to the Armitage report in 1981 said:

"A programme of research and trials on reducing spray from heavy lorries is also nearing completion. The Government hopes this research will produce effective solutions to the problem."

Unfortunately, despite the passage of seven years, that research has not produced the answers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Perhaps in company with the Parliamentary Advisory Council on Transport Safety, which also has a keen and serious interest, the hon. Gentleman might be able to accept an invitation, which I extend now, to come and see spray suppression devices being tested at the Transport and Road Research laboratory at Crowthorne. We do not know everything that is to be known, but we know a great deal more than we did when the Armitage report came out. Most of us, including my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North who may be on his way back, will realise that many lorries have effective spray suppression. The trouble is that many have not.

Mr. Lloyd: In that case, if the research exists but has not been implemented, we have not advanced the argument or the level of safety. There is still considerable confusion about the merits of spray suppression. The Freight Transport Association, which does not and cannot claim to come to the debate with clean hands, makes the point about the research that it conducted that "the results of the tests raised considerable doubts as to the ability of systems constructed to the standard to make any noticeable impression on the nuisance of spray from large commercial vehicles."

If the FTA is wrong, at no point has the Department of Transport published in a systematic form the evidence that shows why and how it is wrong. It is important that that should be done because the haulage industry clearly will resist any attempt to increase its operating costs.

Mr. Sheerman: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Lloyd: In a moment. Clearly the FTA will resist any measure that increases its costs. It is the responsibility of the House to make a rational judgment about the needs of safety irrespective of that resistance. But if the haulage industry resists what it sees as very arbitarily laid standards, that would increase its credibility in other areas and do no service to the argument about heavy goods vehicle safety.

Mr. Sheerman: Will my hon. Friend enlighten the House about how much the FTA thinks that fitting such spray suppression equipment that is currently mandatory in this country puts on the cost of the average vehicle that its members run?

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister will confirm whether I am right or wrong, but the generally accepted figures are about £40 million initially, and then some £2 million on an annual basis.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: If the whole of the draft directive came into effect, as the FTA and the hon. Members for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) know, the figure would be insignificant in terms of the cost of buying a new HGV. The real question that we are considering is whether it is worth applying the directive retrospectively to lighter goods vehicles. In practice, it is generally accepted that it is not. It is really a question whether we can get the heavy goods vehicles to have effective spray suppression and whether we continue —and the Government need to take a lead in this—the research that will lead to even more effective spray suppression. About two thirds of the water thrown up by an HGV at 60 mph can be caught and demisted with the present knowledge. We hope to be able to go further.

Mr. Lloyd: A lorry travelling at 60 mph throws up about 60 gallons of water a minute, so about one gallon is still thrown on the car behind every three seconds. That is a lot of water.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) may have misunderstood me. The Department has sat on the research for too long. This issue has not been a priority since 1981 but the Minister ought to be able to tell us what the research shows. The Department should be considering other methods, such as different road surfaces. The experience of the Netherlands is that an improvement can be achieved by increasing the porosity, if that is the right word, of roads.

Mr. Bottomley: Permeability.

Mr. Lloyd: I am advised that it is permeability, and on this occasion I am prepared to take the Minister's advice.

When the Minister spoke as a human being and not as a powerless Minister, he said that the problem is speed. The Department's national speed survey for 1982—the most recent available—suggested that nearly 40 per cent. of HGVs break the 60-mph limit on motorways. It is recognised that the spray problem really begins at speeds over 40 mph and that the problem is severe at 60 mph as it grows out of all proportion to the increase in speed. The failure to detect those who break the speed limit is crucial here. We do not need further research, just resources.

What normally happens in the Council of Ministers when an issue such as this is raised is that it is tossed around until a compromise is reached. With spray suppression, that compromise will almost inevitably be arbitrary and irrelevant to most member nations. It does not take a genius to recognise that the problem in Greece or southern Italy is fundamentally different from that in Britain. It is therefore likely that southern European members will not accept spray suppression measures in any form.

I am dubious about having permissive regulations. They would provide a ceiling but no floor. When the Department of Transport finally makes a research breakthrough it will not be able to commit this country to an improved standard of spray suppression, should it be necessary. If a permissive document were accepted, we would be limited by the highest standards set by the European Community. The Minister should clarify that important issue.

I do not believe for one second that this directive has a chance of doing anything. It is almost irrelevant to be detaining the House discussing it. We want national legislation that addresses the problems of road surfaces and speeding heavy goods vehicles and tries to introduce standards that will guarantee the maximum possible reduction of nuisance from spray.

I should like to ask the Minister a number of questions about sideguards, or lateral protection as the Eurocrats prefer to call them. They may appear to be technical, but nevertheless they are important. At present, the United Kingdom's standard of sideguard protection applies to heavy goods vehicles of 12 tonnes or more. Earlier, the Minister managed to clear the fog about the wording of the motion, but he has not managed to clear the intellectual fog concerning the figure of 12 tonnes. The probability of a child being dragged off a bicycle under the back wheels of a lorry depends not on axle or laden weights but on the physical construction of the space between front and rear wheels and the possibility of pedestrians and cyclists—the two most obvious groups —disappearing into the space at the side of the lorry. I know of no report—be it the Armitage report or the report of the Transport Select Committee—that recommended the fitting of sideguards to lorries of 12 tonnes. I foresee no reason why the restriction should apply simply to lorries weighing 12 tonnes. I hope that the Minister will consider seriously why we should not increase the applicability of sideguards to heavy goods vehicles that at present are exempted.

I should like to put a point to the Minister that was made clearly at the 10th international technical conference on experimental vehicles, about which the Minister knows much, partly because it was hosted by the "Department of Transportation, of Her Majesty's Government", as it is described in the conference report.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Where did that come from?

Mr. Lloyd: I can assure the Minister that this is not a leak from the Department of Transport. I have not been as lucky as some of my other colleagues with leaks from other Departments.

The conference discussed sideguards and said:

"With a sideguard fitted that just meets the UK".

[Mr. Lloyd]

construction and use.

"regulation, the pedal cyclist was run over"—

hon. Members will be glad to hear that this was a simulated test—

"by the wheels of the semitrailer in about 40 per cent. of the test runs."

That test conformed to current standards, but when the sideguard was reduced to a level of 300mm above the ground the probability of the cyclist being run over was reduced to almost zero.

Experience from Japan suggests that a 400mm level of operation is not only practical but effective in reducing death. While the present regulations almost certainly have reduced the death rate, an increase to a higher standard would reduce it further. I urge the Minister to consider that matter seriously.

The Minister was wrong to argue that these regulations will pave the way for European international haulage vehicles being fitted with sideguards similar to those fitted to British vehicles. The directive, if implemented on a permissive basis, will allow European heavy goods vehicles from countries that choose not to adopt sideguards standards to travel on British roads. That would not only give them a competitive advantage over British operators but would make our roads considerably less safe than they are already. The Minister should look carefully at permissive legislation.

There is a major omission. The overwhelming advice from all reputable documents in the past has been that the greatest area of improvement in the safety of heavy goods vehicles lay in the introduction of front underrun guard protection. That was the Armitage report's recommendation. It said:

"We consider that the greatest and most worthwhile improvements are likely to be obtained from the introduction of under-run and other guards all round the lorry, including energy-absorbing guards. We recommend that these should be made mandatory for all new lorries."

Seven years on we are still awaiting that. That may reflect again the lack of priority given to such safety research within the Department. In 1981 the Department felt that it was close to an acceptable solution and we still do not have that. That should be in the European directive if it is to have any force. It would be of far more significant benefit to road safety than spray suppression or sideguards, but I do not want to dismiss the value of both those things.

The concept of European legislation is rather dubious because we do not have the same interests on our roads as those that apply in other countries. It is not logical to say that the needs and interests of the travelling public in Greece are the same as those in Britain. We have different climates, different road construction and so on. For those reasons, it concerns me greatly that EC directives may hamper us in introducing the highest possible safety standards. I have to agree with the Government's conclusion that the correct thing is to bury the directives completely. Even the directive on sideguards would prevent the Government introducing a higher standard, which is what the Government should be looking at.

That is not a cop-out for taking some action against lorries coming to this country. In 1992 we face the prospect of cabotage. We face the prospect of lorries that have been registered elsewhere coming on to British roads. They will use standards introduced for different road systems. We know—the Minister knows this—that there are British companies operating on British roads which have chosen to register themselves in the Netherlands to avoid some of the existing regulations for heavy goods vehicles. That should be unacceptable and we should not allow the European directives to cloud the issue. It is for the Government to ensure that safety is paramount and to see that what is introduced applies not only to national operators but to international operators on British roads.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the reasonable approach that he has adopted to limit the excesses of the European Community in this important matter. However, rather than devoting so much of his attention to exempting small vehicles from the mandatory Community proposals, perhaps he would serve us better if he were to do something more than his Department has done in the past to reduce the spray from tyres on United Kingdom vehicles that threaten the lives of so many of us who use the motorways.

The Burton constituency has delighted the world over the years with the excellence of its products. I should mention Marmite, Bovril, Branston pickle, the wonderful beer products—Double Diamond, Bass, White Shield, Marston's Pedigree—the new diggers from JCB, the new tyres from Pirelli, the new building systems from Conder, the new civil engineering schemes from Douglas and the new plastic products from BTR. Therefore, it is no surprise that one of my constituents, Mr. Maurice Goodall, formerly of Barton-under-Needwood and now of Rolleston-on-Dove—two delightful villages in my constituency that I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will visit shortly—has invented an anti-spray device that works.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Only this morning, in anticipation of the debate, I travelled past Burton and saw the Bass chimney. As a partial vegetarian, I want my hon. Friend to know that I make an exception for Bovril and that I enjoy the Marmite as well.

Mr. Lawrence: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. The trouble is that too many Ministers pass Burton and do not go into it. If they visited it, they would be better able to enjoy the outstanding products that a lifetime of dedicated labour and intelligent, well-intended and progressive management have produced for a wonderful town.

Mr. Maurice Goodall is no crank. He is a legitimate, sensible and experienced inventor. It surprises me that the Government seem persistently to show little interest in his invention. The device for suppressing spray from heavy vehicles is one whose efficiency of 93 per cent. to 98 per cent. is 10 times more effective than the 65 per cent. that is required by the BS AU 200 specification. Geometrical formulae have been used to overcome the damage caused by the wheels of heavy vehicles and the device negotiates obstacles 10 in. high when a vehicle is fully laden. This is the product of research and development that has absorbed no fewer than 40,000 hours during the past 11 years of Mr. Goodall's time.

Does the Government's reaction stem from the effectiveness of current anti-spray devices? As my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has said, any motorist travelling along a motorway in bad weather takes his life into his hands when he overtakes heavy vehicles that are churning up so much spray. We can send men to the moon, and we have wonderful devices that deliver messages to us wherever we happen to be in the House, but it seems that we cannot eradicate or reduce the murderous spray generated by heavy vehicles.

It is clear from the comments on the European Community proposals that have been made by the organisations most closely related to this issue that the safety effect of many of the present spray devices leaves much to be desired. The Freight Transport Association states:

"the equipment for its suppression, either under present British rules or under those which the Commission proposes, has at best a marginal effect."

VAG (United Kingdom) Ltd. states:

"The company suggests that standards developed to meet relevant British regulations have been hastily concocted. It argues that standards of design have been over-emphasised at the expense of standards of performance and that there is no evidence that these British standards have had the effect of significantly reducing spray emissions."

Volvo Trucks (Great Britain) Limited says:

"The Company concludes that further technical work would be advisable before the adoption of any Community rules and that since the bulk of the relevant expertise is British, this should be carried out in this country, with proper consultation with interested parties."

It is quite clear from our own experience and the knowledge and experience of various organisations that the present anti-spray devices are not sufficiently effective and efficient to save our lives.

I have been involved with Mr. Goodall for four years, during which time he has been trying to interest the Department in his device. Correspondence has been travelling backwards and forwards and there may have been a meeting or two, but still nothing is done. The matter is now in the hands of Mr. Robert Moreland, who was the Member of the European Parliament for the Staffordshire, East constituency until the last European election, when he was less than fortunate. I have no doubt that he will return to the European Community, where he currently serves on a number of transport committees. Mr. Moreland is doing his best to bring Mr. Goodall's invention to the attention of those who apparently will do something in the European Community.

I propose to hand to my hon. Friend a dossier of documents, which are now slightly out of date but can immediately be updated. It is clear that, so excellent is the tradition of creative, progressive developments in my constituency, so confident can we be when an excellent inventor comes along with an excellent and desirable product, that I can draw the conclusion only that, although the documents have, over the years, been handed to the Department, they have not been brought to the attention of my hon. Friend who, I know, personally considers anything that might contribute to road safety. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for taking the documents. I hope to hear further from him so that lives can be saved by the excellent invention of my constituent Mr. Goodall.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I welcome the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) to the ranks of those hon. Members who want regulation on matters relating to road safety. Had Mr. Maurice Goodall been involved in the invention of seat belts, I wonder whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would have paid the glowing tributes that he has this evening. However, I welcome any late converts to regulation on road safety matters.

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. Gentleman will recall that I was not opposed to having seat belts, wearing seat belts or improvements to seat belts. I was opposed only to compulsion.

Mr. Sheerman: I misunderstood. I thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman not only wanted his constituent's invention to be introduced, but wanted it to be fitted to heavy goods vehicles to protect people driving on roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I say confidentially to the hon. Gentleman that he should lay off my hon. and learned Friend. It is worth recognising that, because of my hon. and learned Friend's relative reticence, we managed to get the child restraint Bill through the House. We may yet have to consider Lords amendments, and I do not want to do anything that might in any way provoke my hon. and learned Friend to think that fluoride has anything to do with that Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: I think that both the Minister and the hon. and learned Gentleman understand that my comments were light badinage.

We are discussing a serious matter that has been tucked away late in our proceedings. I campaigned vigorously for anti-spray and anti-splash devices to be fitted to heavy goods vehicles because of the large number of accidents resulting in death and serious injury to innocent people. It always surprises me that the consumers on motorways and other roads have not been more vociferous or active about the conditions that they put up with when travelling. It must be unique for me to agree with the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), but it is high time that there was effective regulation of vehicles that cause dangerous splash and spray.

I was part of a successful campaign to introduce regulations on splash and spray that were as good as we could achieve at that time. The nature of research means that we have to accept the technical device that is effective at that time. Science and technology always move on. I am suspicious of lobbies and spokesmen for different industry groups who say, "Don't introduce this standard; something is coming over the horizon that will be 100 per cent. perfect and wonderful." If a splash or spray device is produced that is 40 or 60 per cent. effective, let us have it and wait for the 100 per cent. to follow, and then go for a higher standard in the fullness of time.

I am always suspicious of the Road Haulage Association Ltd. and similar organisations, whose common denominator seems to be opposition to anything that will cost their members a few pennies or a few pounds. I do not say that in a narrow, nationalistic sense because I have spoken—and I must declare this interest—for Monsanto in the United States about the British experience and about how effective it had been in reducing splash and spray. That was something on which we showed the way in this country, so I am sad at the present situation.

Three years ago, we had Road Safety Year, which was introduced by the European Commission. I am a late convert to Europeanism. For many years I campaigned against the Common Market, although later I was convinced that it was something we had to accept. Even so, I get rather cross when I see this kind of directive, which brings everything down to the lowest common denominator. We have lost the opportunity for countries to lead the way and for the best practice to be adopted. This directive is permissive and a cop-out. It allows countries which want a higher standard to stay with it and introduce one, and others to opt out. That is a sad state of affairs, when the best practice is the thing to aim for.

One question the Minister has not answered—it is an aspect on which he has not campaigned vigorously enough—is what is to be done about those vehicles which arrive at our Channel ports and drive on British roads, causing as much splash, spray and danger as British vehicles. They will be largely unregulated. They may come from dry countries such as Spain and Greece, which do not see it as being in their short-term interest to introduce appropriate measures. However, when vehicles from those countries reach German, French and British roads, which are wetter, they ought to be regulated in the same way as other safety regulations are applied to foreign vehicles travelling on our roads.

Year after year, the number of non-British European vehicles travelling on British motorways increases. Hon. Members can see that for themselves as they drive to and from their constituencies. To have rules and regulations covering only British heavy goods vehicles is plainly daft. I refer to Norfolk Line and to the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) about sideguards. He made only one slip on the subject of splash and spray, and perhaps that was because he was briefed by different people. In terms of splash and spray, we must acknowledge that it is not good enough to accept vehicles from other countries entering Britain and causing a great deal of damage to citizens driving on our roads.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend admits that he is a late convert to the European dream—although I still regard it as being a pipedream rather than an ideal. Nevertheless, the danger of the European directive in being permissive is exactly as has been pointed out by my hon. Friend. It will not only allow vehicles from other European countries to enter Britain but will also make it impossible for the Government to do anything to make them conform to the British standard. The directive will allow foreign vehicles to operate at the lower standard.

Mr. Sheerman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I was merely going to say that he was too gentlemanly to mention that Norfolk Line and others are registering their fleets in other countries to evade simple safety regulations that do not cost all that much money.

It was part of European Road Safety Year to act on those two matters, and it is sad for future campaigns that none of the objectives of Road Safety Year are to be achieved, because it means that the European Commission and the Community cannot deliver. It is a kind of opt-out Community. As my hon. Friend says, what we need is best practice in the Community, so that we are all protected evenly across all countries.

I had the misfortune to travel from Felixstowe to Bury St. Edmunds. The experience of driving in wet weather on that road, where the percentage of foreign vehicles is very high, shows in grim and graphic detail the problems of the permissive directive approach.

I agree with my hon. Friend's remarks about side underruns, and about the need to grasp the nettle of front underruns. Many members of the British public do not understand that front underruns are the kind with which most vehicles are involved in accidents, and we must take some action on them.

I regret the regulations. We should not reach a stage at which the European Community merely says that there are good standards achievable on the basis of the technology that we have now. That may be the technology that the constituent of the hon. and learned Member for Burton is about to introduce, but whatever it is, it should be for all member states.

11.6 pm

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) can be brief at greater length than any other hon. Member who has contributed to the debate. I shall seek to be even briefer.

First, let me ask my hon. Friend the Minister not to try to avoid responsibility outside the motor industry. It is far too easy to do what we all do rather glibly and blame the road haulier and the designer. We should also think about the roads. Many parts of the country have no motorways and never will have, but they do have quite long, wide roads, and the water sweeping across them makes them more dangerous than motorways.

Much of the problem relates to road design—to windbreaks and lightbreaks. It is too easy to blame the heavy lorry and the motorway. I ask my hon. Friend to bear in mind the side wind, which is just as important. It is patent to anyone who drives, as I frequently do, along 50 miles of rather poor west country road—shortly to be improved by the link road to Barnstaple—and then on to the M5 and the M4, that side winds and poor visibility cause equal danger on the bad road.

Every hon. Member who has spoken has referred to "passing" when they mean overtaking. There is frequently a danger of approaching a vehicle and then going past it through a sheet of water, possibly finding some fool coming up behind the lorry and seeking to overtake. The great mistake is always to blame the awful juggernaut or road haulier on the wet motorway. I suspect that nothing in aerodynamics will ever stop spray from coming up on a wet road when a fast vehicle is going along it, whatever the shape of that vehicle. As more wide but single carriageway roads are built, there is an increasing danger of the hard cross wind on exposed parts.

I shall say no more except to thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his great concern about road safety. It is always a pleasure to listen to what he says, even if our constituents—particularly road hauliers—do not always agree.

11.10 pm

Mr. Ian Mills (Meriden): The problem is complex; the solution should be easy. I spent 20 years as a tyre designer and part of the problem is the design of the tyre. I still have a strong interest in tyres and in roads, as my hon. Friend the Minister knows. Part of the problem is that roads are not porous. Water does not disappear down into roads; it goes out at the sides. Roads have to be properly drained. We have to find a solution in the design of both concrete and asphalt roads, as well as anti-spray devices.

Having read the European directive, I am appalled to see that under category II(1) it says that devices exist to eliminate spray, and that

> "Both types of material have been developed over the last few years in Europe and elsewhere and are being produced by at least ten or more manufacturers."

I was present at least 10 years ago—if not 15 or 20 years ago—when Monsanto and others came up with what they called the plastic grass solution and the rubber mat solution. The solution has been available in various forms for over 10 years. All this talk about technicalities really makes me wild. My constituency includes the M42 and the M6—right in the heart of England—and I travel those motorways often. However, I still do not see any beneficial results from what we have done as a Government in seeking to ensure that heavy goods vehicles create less spray. I still have many constituents saying to me, "You said 10 or 20 years ago that the technical solution was there. What are you going to do about it?" The answer is not in this directive.

The Minister should use his able powers of persuasion, which he has done on many other items of road safety, to achieve progress. To discuss the technicalities of this matter is all very well but there should be an easy solution whereby we can equip heavy goods vehicles with simple devices, which will not cost the operators a tremendous amount of money. If the simple devices are judged not to be right under the appropriate British standard, at least something is better than nothing.

I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and I encourage his inventor to put forward his ideas. Surely after all this time Europe should be able to come to a solution. If foreign vehicles are creating the problem, I ask the Minister to ensure that they will achieve the standards that we need.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am grateful to the hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. It is an important issue and everyone who uses the roads when wet knows of the dangers that spray can create.

I pick up one point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Speller). If a heavy lorry is travelling along a motorway or a high-quality dual carriageway trunk road at, say, 60 miles an hour and throwing up a lot of spray, there is a sensible safe option to other motorists, which is not to try to overtake it. There is no reason why every domestic car driver should think that it is their duty to overtake every heavy goods vehicle, whether in wet or dry weather. I often think that we regard overtaking an HGV as a challenge and we somehow suffer in esteem if we do not always succeed in overtaking it.

There has been a significant advance in vehicles with spray suppression. Much of this debate has been concerned with spray suppression, because the sideguard issue, which is basic protection for pedestrians and cyclists, in non-controversial. The question whether they are rounded sideguards or flat sideguards is not enormously important. However, as the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr.Lloyd) mentioned, the height can be important. I will write to him on that matter and place a copy in the Library.

The issue of front underrun guards will be discussed in the House in the future. The Transport and Road Research laboratory is acknowledged all around the world as one of the leaders in virtually every subject that it takes up. Its work does show that energy-absorbing front underrun guards can help to save many of the lives presently lost in the approximately 250 serious crashes a year against the front of heavy goods vehicles.

We are basically considering spray suppression in the debate. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has raised the question of his constituent, the inventor, Mr. Maurice Goodall. As well as handing me the dossier that my hon. and learned Friend has with him, it may be appropriate if I ask the Department to consider an up-to-date submission from Mr. Goodall. I know that my hon. and learned Friend will facilitate that and I am grateful to him for raising that issue. The whole political process goes from one person's private experience, publicly expressed—people often have to be persistent—which is then adopted by the overwhelming minority, which is likely to include the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). I have paid tribute to the work of the parliamentary advisory committee and I pay tribute also to the hon. Gentleman as an individual.

I think that I can overcome some of the insults that were offered up by the hon. Member for Stretford. Sometimes I am accused of being power-crazed and sometimes of being powerless. I think that I work in good partnership with the knowledgeable people in the Department of Transport and in Parliament. Between us we have managed to create what the European Road Safety Year in 1986 was designed for—a cut in road accidents and road casualties.

In the year after European Road Safety Year, we saw a 10 per cent. cut in the casualty rate in Britain, which has left us one of the top four countries, with Japan, Norway and Sweden. It is important that the United Kingdom is up there. It is not coincidental that we are the country that brought in spray suppression regulations. I hope that other countries will follow us.

However, we want to allow ourselves the freedom to develop more effective measures. The House will be interested to know that we are in the final stages of research into whole vehicle testing on spray suppression. As I said earlier, the aerodynamics matter as much as the actual water or mist catching behind the axles and wheels. When we can move forward, we shall be able to see how other countries react. My suspicion is that in the same way that the Commission has modelled the draft directive on the British regulations, when we get to whole vehicle testing, it will be prepared to forward with a draft directive which is likely to be acceptable to others.

The hon. Member for Stretford raised the question of publishing and demonstrating the effectiveness of spray suppression. It would be sensible if we laid on a demonstration—not just for hon. Members who are interested, but for the media. Many operators do not understand why Parliament wants spray suppressed. Enough horrifying crashes and collisions have been linked to the reduction in visibility that is suffered, especially by HGV drivers. Spray is not just a problem for those behind who are trying to look forward; it is a problem for those sitting in the driver's cab and trying to look back.

It might be appropriate if I pay a tribute to British Road Services. I spent today in the BRS midland region in Nottingham and Birmingham, looking at vehicle maintenance. It is worth remembering that every HGV and trailer in this country is maintained. I also looked at driver training. If more operators trained their drivers as BRS does, and maintained their vehicles as BRS does, we should see fewer dangers on the roads and more spray suppression devices installed and maintained.

The debate has been useful

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I should like the Minister to address one point even if he does not answer it now. With 1992 aproaching and with the prospects that hon. Members of all parties have already put to the Minister of British roads being flooded, or at least entered, by Spanish and Portuguese drivers, how will the directives apply if, as the Government want, they are permissive? Will my fears be proved accurate and will Spanish lorries, for example, coming on to Britain's roads be protected by the directive and allowed here without adequate spray suppression devices?

Mr. Bottomley: One reason why, in my guess—it is no more than that—we shall not get a directive is that the draft directive cannot be accepted by most European countries. If the Commission's draft directive on spray is not accepted, we have the opportunity to go forward with our own work. It might be possible for the Commission to come forward with a directive that would receive unanimous support even as a permissive directive, which is the best way of protecting ourselves. As the House knows, we do not have the opportunity of putting requirements on international hauliers unless there is a directive which is either mandatory on all European Community hauliers or is permissive but has been adopted by European nations. It is important to work towards what is practicable and demonstrably cost-effective. In that way we shall get the type of protection that the hon. Member for Stretford and I seek.

The debate has shown that the motion demonstrates the mood of the House. I am grateful to each hon. Gentleman who has spoken and I am glad that this issue does not arouse any unnecessary party prejudice. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Huddersfield has joined his leader in welcoming our membership of the Common Market and let us milk that for what it is worth.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 8284/87 on spray suppression devices and lateral protection (sideguards) for certain categories of motor vehicles and their trailers; and endorses the Government's objectives of securing Community arrangements which would not require more stringent standards than those required in the United Kingdom at present, and amendment of the proposed Directive on spray suppression so as to make its application, like the proposed Directive on sideguards, permissive rather than mandatory, and restricted in scope to the same categories of vehicles as are covered by the existing United Kingdom Regulations.

PETITION

Search and Rescue (North Devon)

11.19 pm

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I seek to present a humble petition on behalf of the residents of and visitors to north Devon who fear that helicopters of 22 Squadron (Search and Rescue), at present stationed at RAF Chivenor in north Devon, may be removed to RAF Brawdy in south Wales. There is an additional 30 minutes flying time from RAF Brawdy to north Devon and the petitioners believe that that flying time is too great to provide the same standard of cliff, moor and sea rescue facilities that presently prevails along the north Devon coast and throughout the area.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House recognise the threat to safety and presses the Secretary of State for Defence to ensure that this service is continued from RAF Chivenor.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Factory Space (Northern Region)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Howarth.]

11.20 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I wish to discuss the question of factory space because it is important to the recovery of the northern economy.

I do not believe that there is much dispute about the nature of the problem. The Minister is well aware that there is an acute shortage of medium to large factories —between 7,000 and 50,000 sq ft—in the north. The good news is that the demand for units of more than 7,000 sq ft has doubled in the past year. I understand that, up to 1 March 1988, there had been 511 inquiries about such sites, and the inquiries are continuing. The bad news is that the supply of such factories has fallen by 37 per cent. English Estates estimates that there are about 350 buildings of more than 7,000 sq ft now available in the north, but only 40 of them are sites of quality—that is, built in the past 10 years—which would attract inward investors. Some of those 40 buildings are already reserved. I understand that English Estates (North) told the Minister that there are only five modern premises of more than 10,000 sq ft which are vacant but not reserved.

A few examples will demonstrate the problems faced by different areas. In April 1986, in Durham there was almost 4 million sq ft of floor space available. By April 1988 the amount had been reduced to just over 2 million sq ft. In April 1987 there were 53 units of more than 15,000 sq ft, but by April 1988 that figure had gone down to 21, many of which are unsuitable for inward investors.

In Sunderland the demise of the Washington development corporation, coupled with the English Industrial Estates lack of resources, means that there will be no large-scale building in the borough until 1989-90 at the earliest. There are no modern units of more 10,000 sq ft availble in the borough.

In the Wear valley—I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster) is on the Front Bench—there is no space available of more than 2,000 sq ft. English Estates has no plans to build there until October 1989.

What are the reasons for this considerable problem? First, few medium or large factories were built during the first half of this decade. The recession was the obvious reason for that. The possibility of rectifying the situation and increasing the supply has been curtailed by the reduced numbers of advance factory providers.

The major problem has been created by the winding up of Washington, Aycliffe and Peterlee new towns because in the past the new towns have been major providers of advance factory space. In Durham, for example, Aycliffe and Peterlee have been responsible for 370,000 sq ft compared with the 430,000 sq ft being built by English Estates—in other words, for roughly half. Now almost the whole of the advance factory programme will depend on what English Estates and the Rural Development Commission do. In their turn, English Estates is now tightly stretched and is planning only 10 extra factories above 10,000 sq ft in the coming financial year, which will not meet the demand. Therefore, the inescapable conclusion is that the north is rapidly running out of large-scale factory units for inward investors or for existing businesses that want to expand. The demand for space now exceeds the supply, so there is a real danger that the north could lose potential investors to other regions.

The Government's answer is that, given the low supply of factories and the high level of demand, rents will eventually rise to a point which will attract private sector development. I am sure that that is what the Minister will tell me tonight, as the Secretary of State has already told me and a delegation which I led to see him before the recess. I have no ideological objections whatever to the private sector making a contribution. On the contrary, I am strongly in favour of partnership, as in the development agencies in my constituency and in that of my hon. Friend, between the public and private sectors to encourage development. I am prepared to accept that there should be some rise in rents, although it is a fallacy to think, as some do, that English Estates is not already asking for the market rent which industry will pay.

My difficulty and the difficulty of everybody who knows about the problem in the region is with the timescale. In reality, it will probably take at least two to four years of famine for factory rents to reach a level which is likely to attract private investors. Even then, the market will work unevenly. Some areas are likely to continue to prove unattractive to private investors in terms of rent potential. The likelihood is that if the Government continue to insist that we should wait for the private sector to invest, there will be a sizeable gap. Meantime, inward investors will be discouraged and go elsewhere, either to Scotland and Wales, where the development agencies have ensured that there is much more of the right kind of factory space and they have powers over planning as well as industrial development, or even turn to other countries. That is the problem that we face in the northern region.

The Government should now be taking steps to manage the gap between now and the time when the private sector comes in, if it does, off its own bat and without any incentives. Because I am constructive, which is what we should be in an Adjournment debate, I want to suggest some solutions which will help the north provide factory space which industry so desperately needs. Clearly what is needed is a transitional period during which the public and private sectors will work in partnership to help cushion the risk for the private sector. I accept the Minister's solution because he represents the Government, but I am trying to make sense of his solution. That is why I am trying to help him by suggesting possible partnership mechanisms.

First, the Government could provide tax concessions to the private sector to come in, such as are currently available in enterprise zones. Secondly, there could be a partnership agreement between the public and private sectors where the infrastructure for a factory development is provided by, say, English Estates and/or where English Estates makes grants to private sector companies for building purposes. Thirdly, the Government could allow English Estates to take what is called a head lease as a way of guaranteeing minimal rents to the private sector, thus encouraging it to come in.

These partnership mechanisms could be used by themselves or as elements in a package. I am not asking the Minister for snap answers tonight; it is too late for that. I offer him these ideas to study. Indeed, I go further: I would be prepared to write the Minister a paper on the proposals which I have made because I would like him to examine them in detail.

The Minister must take the problem seriously, as everyone in the northern region does. It would be a tragedy—indeed, it would be unforgivable—if the long-awaited economic upswing in the north were to be choked by a shortage of factory space. If the Government are not prepared to fund public sector investment—I understand their thinking on this, although I do not necessarily accept it—they should at least be prepared to provide the facilities for a partnership between the public and private sectors which could help bridge the investment gap and provide the factory space which the north needs so much.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): I congratulate the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) on raising this subject by way of an Adjournment debate. I also welcome the spirit in which he addressed the House. I shall certainly consider the detail of what he has said and look forward to the report by a man of his education; doubtless it will be couched in delightful English. We shall consider it carefully.

The hon. Gentleman raised an important subject. Before I deal with the specific issue of factory space, I want to put the problem in the wider context of the improvements in the economy which have created the demand to which he has referred. As I heard one of my hon. Friends say in a sedentary intervention, these ironically are the problems of success. It is not just the Government who are proclaiming the resurgence in the north-east; the local CBI and chambers of commerce confirm a firmly established trend of increased demand, output and sales across a range of industries. Business confidence and optimism for the future are at their highest for some time.

I have paid visits to the north, as some Opposition Members will know, and have much enjoyed them, so much so that I am considering whether to spend a holiday there in August. I hope that hon. Members will recognise the attractions of their own area which my family may appreciate.

The region still faces special problems and has special needs and the Government now have policies that are more effectively focused to deal with them. The message that the north-east is an area of opportunity and growth with everything going for it in terms of availability of good skilled labour, good communications, excellent social, leisure and cultural facilities has reached the foreign investor who does not have a prejudiced and stereotyped image of the north-east. Such an image is sometimes presented in the media and, perhaps regrettably, talked about by those who live there. I have that problem in my part of the north of England and I spend much of my time trying to persuade people not to talk down their own region.

As I have said, the Japanese are particularly attracted to the north. They have seen the region and like it. Nissan, which has 2,700 jobs in prospect by the early 1990s, is acting as a catalyst for encouraging other companies, and not only Japanese companies, to the region. There are 21 Japanese firms in the region, one quarter of the national total, and about 220 foreign-owned firms employing 36,000 people. All this has helped to broaden the region's economic base, and has introduced new skills and work practices to the north.

One of the most encouraging developments is the growth of entrepreneurship in the north-east, a region without any recent tradition of self-employment. The region has made great strides in this direction in recent years.

I should now like to come to the specific question raised in the debate. I am well aware of the demand for factory space, not only because the hon. Member for Durham, North brought a delegation to see me and has talked to me, but also because my hon. Friends have brought it to my attention. I am delighted to see my hon. Friends the Members for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), for Hexham (Mr. Amos), for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) and for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) expressing their commitment and interest. They are here in slightly greater numbers than the Opposition but I recognise that the hour is late and I do not make much point of that.

The hon. Member for Durham, North was fortunate enough to get this debate and there is interest in it in all parts of the House. The demand for factory space has substantially increased in the past year in many parts of the assisted areas, and I recognise that the amount of vacant space has declined. As I have said, this increased demand arises from the sustained economic upturn brought about by Government policies.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge what the Government have already done in this area. The level of resources going towards factory building by English Estates in the assisted areas as a whole has been substantially increased in recent years. In 1986-87 its capital development programme was £33·5 million. In 1987-88, it was increased to £47 million. For 1988-89 we have authorised English Estates to spend up to £49 million if it can produce the necessary resources from asset sales. These are record capital investment levels for English Estates and represent very significant action already taken by the Government. We have also established a new programme for English Estates to provide managed work space in the inner-city areas in partnership with the private sector. The resources for that programme are additional to the figures that I have just given.

Perhaps I could mention just two examples of how English Estates money has been spent in the north-east and to what effect. In 1980, the British Steel plant in Consett closed down. Over 28 per cent. of the working population were jobless. English Estates was called upon to help and, as part of the Derwentside task force, set about attracting new employers to the area. As a sign of its commitment, it opened an office and invested £12 million, building about 800,000 sq ft of property in five years. That was a mixture of large factories, small workshops, and premises designed for high technology businesses. As new companies moved in, over 2,500 jobs were created in the local community putting Consett well on the road to recovery.

More recently English Estates have built the computer aided design and computer aided manufacturing centre on the banks of the River Tees, the first of its kind in Europe, Funded by the public sector, the £1·5 million centre provides advice and powerful computing and information resources for high-tech businesses that are crucial to the future success of the north and the rest of the country.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I thought that the Minister was about to say a little more about Consett. I hope that he recognises that the very agencies that he congratulated are presently saying very loudly that they desperately need the next stage so that the firms that may be ready to expand are able to do so. Despite much effort, those agencies have not been able to attract private sector funding to aid such developments. Indeed, we are looking for some commitment to support the work that the development agency and the task force have already done.

Mr. Atkins: The hon. Lady draws attention to a point that we have accepted. I have said that it is a problem of success, but I recognise that none the less it is a problem.

I am advised that there is an increasing number of inquiries from the private sector to both Teesside and Tyne and Wear development corporations, which suggests that the climate for private sector investment is steadily improving in the north-east, largely as a result of the well-publicised shortage of advance factory space to which the hon. Member for Durham, North has already referred and to which I know my hon. Friends have referred previously.

I have given some examples of the organisation and development programme for English Estates. The question now is what the Government should be authorising English Estates to do in future in the light of booming demand for factory space. The call from some quarters has been for more public sector resource to satisfy current demand.

That approach is unattractive for a number of reasons, not least because the additional resources required would be very substantial. But there is a more fundamental reason, which has to do with the role of English Estates and our ultimate policy objective in that area. English Estates' role is to fill a gap in the market so that industrial and commercial premises can be provided in the assisted areas where the private sector is unwilling to risk the necessary investment.

The aim is that the activities of English Estates should encourage the private sector. Our objective, which I hope is shared by Opposition Members, is a properly functioning property market serviced by the private sector and flexible enough to be able to respond to the demands of the market in the north-east just as in the south. Our judgment is that pumping in more public sector resources would be very likely to delay the achievement of that long-term objective rather than to encourage it.

The current situation in the north-east offers an opportunity that we do not wish to miss to secure that objective. It is quite true that, for a lengthy period, yield levels have not been sufficient to stimulate private sector provision of industrial premises outside the south-east. With the changing economic climate, increasing demand and rising rents, returns are beginning to look more acceptable. The job for the region, as the chief executive of the Northern Development Company has recently recognised, is to do all it can to draw in private sector investment.

I do not pretend that that will happen overnight. There is bound to be a transitional period during which excess demand helps the necessary process of increasing rents to levels which will provide an adequate return to the private sector, but the consequence of avoiding the discomfort of such a transition by increasing Government-funded provision would be to miss the major opportunity to re-create a private sector property market which I have mentioned.

That approach does not mean that the Government are ignoring the issue. There are a number of Government initiatives which are relevant to the provision of industrial and commercial property. The hon. Member mentioned the role of the two urban development corporations in the north-east, in Tyne and Wear and Teesside. Each is likely to spend well over £100 million during the next five years. The work of the UDCs is of major importance in creating the conditions to bring back private sector investment.

As far as English Estates is concerned, we are currently in active discussion with the board about how best its resources can be used in the areas where there is least prospect of an early return by the private sector and how, more generally, it can adapt its programmes and policies to give further encouragement to the private sector to respond to the current demand.

I am particularly pleased that the hon. Gentleman felt able to make his remarks in a spirit of understanding the Government's position, while not necessarily accepting it. I know that some of what the hon. Gentleman has said has been considered before, but it needs further consideration. As he has been kind enough to say that he will produce a report, although he did not give a time scale——

Mr. Radice: It will be two or three weeks.

Mr. Atkins: I think that we can manage that. We look forward to receiving the report. We shall not make any policy decisions, so I can assure the hon. Gentleman that his views will be taken fully into account. He will understand, however, that I cannot give any guarantees about the results.

It is not simply a matter of public sector agencies encouraging the private sector. There is an opportunity, which I hope will be seized, for the private sector to reassess the risks involved and for investors and developers to expand the geographical spread of their activities. I believe that the present rising trend in the level of rents is a healthy sign for the north, confirming what I know my hon. Friends believe to be the case—they frequently tell the House that life in the north is not as bad as it is sometimes depicted. I am sure that the future of the north, and the substantial demand for factory space, which we all agree is a sign of economic success, means that private sector provision is not far off in many areas.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

National Pig Breeders Association

1. Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the president of the National Pig Breeders Association; and what matters were discussed.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John MacGregor): My ministerial colleagues and I keep in regular touch with representatives of pig producers, including the National Pig Breeders Association, on a wide range of issues.

Mr. Baker: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the serious state of the pig industry, with a large number of pig breeders going out of business? Will he bear in mind the need to continue his pressure in Europe for the abolition of MCAs? Will he examine allegations that some EEC countries are illegally subsidising their pig industries? That practice is unfair competition.

Mr. MacGregor: Yes, I am aware of the position of the pig industry. Although prices recently stabilised, as my hon. Friend knows, we are in the classic situation of supply outstripping demand, which is the basic cause of the problem. There is a strong case for the abolition of pigmeat MCAs, and I have been making that case in the Council. As always, it is one of the most hotly contested issues in any Council discussion, with several member states taking different views. It is not easy to get the required majority for any line of action.

On my hon. Friend's point about unfair state aids, the Commission is investigating an Italian state aid, which I think will be found to be illegal. It is also investigating French state aids. We are always assiduous in drawing such matters to the Council's attention.

Mr. Martlew: Is the Minister aware that, according to the latest figures from the National Pig Breeders Association, in the year to April, the prices that breeders were paid for pig products dropped by 12 per cent., yet the increase in supermarket prices was 2 per cent.? Can the Minister explain that? Could the reason be that a cartel is being run by the major superstores in this country?

Mr. MacGregor: They are matters for commercial consideration. The basic reason why pig prices have fallen is that supply and demand are currently out of balance; supply is greater than demand. However, although the price to pig producers has fallen, the average ex-farm price of feed wheat is now nearly £17 per tonne lower and that feed barley is about £5 per tonne lower than they were at this time last year. That is undoubtedly helping margins.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the serious position of the pig industry in Northern Ireland, which is on the periphery of the United Kingdom? Can he give the House any inkling about how his negotiations are going and what is being done to rid us of MCAs?

Mr. MacGregor: Ever since price-fixing discussions began I have been pressing pigmeat MCAs as one of my main issues, and I shall continue to do so. I have again done so this week. We shall return to the Council on Monday of next week, when it is hoped that we shall start to reach conclusions. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall again press the matter then.

Dr. David Clark: In his discussions with the National Pig Breeders Association, did the Minister discuss the implications for the pigmeat trade of the freeing of the market in 1992? Can he guarantee that the health of the British public will remain protected against infected imported meats?

Mr. MacGregor: Obviously I bear the move to 1992 very much in mind when arguing for the elimination of pigmeat MCAs. However, I believe that that case is already very strong because the current position is out of kilter with the original reason for setting pigmeat MCAs, so I should like them to be eliminated now. Certainly it should be done by 1992.

We are moving towards harmonisation with regard to protection against disease within the Community. However, it is very important that we have guarantees from countries that are swine fever free that their Governments are as assiduous as we are in ensuring that those areas remain disease free.

National Farmers Union

3. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the president of the National Farmers Union; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. MacGregor: I last met the president of the National Farmers Union formally on 16 May when we discussed the Commission's 1988-89 farm price proposals. I have met him informally on a number of occasions since.

Mr. Bellingham: When my right hon. Friend next meets the president, will he make clear to him the importance of the sugar beet sector to Norfolk farmers, particularly bearing in mind the despondency in agriculture at the moment? Sugar beet is one of the few bright lights on the horizon. Will he assure the House that no sugar beet package will be agreed at Monday's Council meeting that puts the United Kingdom at a competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis Italy and France? Will he do all that he can to persuade the Community to prevent Italy and France from renewing national aid to their sugar beet production sectors?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend will know that I am extremely well aware of the importance of sugar beet to Norfolk farmers. I can, therefore, assure him that I will endeavour to achieve what he asks. At the moment the Commission's proposal is for a price freeze which would not affect the competitive position of the United Kingdom industry. An attempt was made during the lead-up to the summit reforms to undermine our position through the sugar supplementary levy and we successfully fought that off. With regard to the aids in France and Italy, there is no Commission proposal to that effect in the price fixing at the moment.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Does the Minister agree with the statement made by the president of the National Farmers Union today that up to 30 per cent. of support to sheep farmers will be cut under the present proposals of the EEC policy for sheepmeat?

Mr. MacGregor: That will not happen under the proposals before us on stabilisers—which is the issue that we have already decided—unless there is a massive increase in sheepmeat production which would cause the stabiliser to be triggered in a substantial way. I do not envisage that happening. I have not seen the statement, but I imagine that the president had in mind the future of the sheepmeat regime as a whole. We have not yet embarked on discussions on that, so it is not possible to predict the outcome.

Miss Emma Nicholson: On his next visit to the National Farmers Union, will my right hon. Friend be kind enough to raise the problems raised with me by the Devon branch of the Women's Farmers Union about the continuing and upgraded use of bovine somatotropin in the production of milk? The Women's Farming Union believes that the lack of labelling of milk produced by that method will have a still further depressing effect on the sale of Dorset milk.

Mr. MacGregor: There is a question later on the Order Paper about product licensing and that is what will determine whether we see a big expansion, or any expansion, in BST milk. I will answer that question when we come to it and we will have to look at the question of labelling. If there is consumer concern about BST, labelling may be the way to tackle it. However, that raises many commercial considerations which will have to be discussed widely.

Dr. David Clark: In view of the comments of the Select Committee on the Environment on the NFU's sanguine view and the Department's complacent attitude towards agricultural pollution, when the Minister next meets the president of the NFU will he draw his attention to the fact that farm pollution incidents are at their highest recorded level? Will he also tell him that enough really is enough?

Mr. MacGregor: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we do not take a sanguine view of farm pollution. He will have seen the comments of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State earlier this week when the latest report was published. We take the matter very seriously and I am anxious to reduce substantially the number of farm pollution incidents. We are not sanguine about the matter.

Milk Marketing Board

4. Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board; and what subjects he proposes to discuss.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Donald Thompson): My right hon. Friend expects to meet the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board later today to discuss various issues affecting the dairy industry.

Mr. Hicks: When my right hon. Friend next meets the chairman of the Milk Marketing Board to discuss New Zealand butter, will he confirm that the purpose of the transitional period, which started 15 years ago, was to enable New Zealand to seek alternative markets for its dairy products but that it still has one third of the United Kingdom packed butter market? Is not there evidence that New Zealand can benefit from world markets by the increase in the price of dairy products in those markets? In the last four years alone, that has enabled New Zealand to benefit to the tune of an additional £180 million.

Mr. Thompson: New Zealand's agricultural interests have been active in putting their case throughout Europe and the world. It will be for the Commission to devise any new arrangements with the New Zealand Government and the New Zealand butter industry. New Zealand butter is not part of our quota arrangements.

Mr. Ron Brown: Is not the European Economic Community a cynical con which makes people suffer, especially small farmers and working-class individuals? Would it not be better if we were honest enough to face the fact that Britain suffers in many ways because of the EEC and that it would be far better to withdraw from it instead of kidding people that the EEC matters? It matters only to rich farmers and to people in big business. That is a fact.

Mr. Thompson: It is not a fact that all classes of people in Britain suffer from this country being in the EEC. The contrary is true.

Mr. Jack: Is my hon. Friend fully satisfied that the Milk Marketing Board has taken every opportunity to develop innovatory products to counter the flow of foreign-produced dairy products on to our supermarket shelves?

Mr. Thompson: The Milk Marketing Board, together with Dairy Crest, is alive to the competition that it faces on the supermarket shelves. That competition will expand if people continue to buy foreign goods. I am sure that the MMB is looking at every possible way of adding value to milk, thus competing by producing import substitutes, and that it will also do everything it possibly can to find markets for its exports.

Set-Aside

5. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the first arable land to be set aside under his new proposals.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall be making an anouncement shortly on the implementation in the United Kingdom of the Community set-aside scheme in order to enable it to go ahead in time for this autumn's planting.

Mr. Pike: The Minister has a tight timetable. He has to have a scheme in place by 14 July. Does he intend to allow the option of extensive grazing to be used? If so, what type of payment will be involved? If the Minister intends to permit that option to be used, will it not create other problems for agriculture?

Mr. MacGregor: Those matters will have to await the announcement, but the hon. Gentleman is right when he says that there is a tight time schedule. We have been working very hard and we are in the final stages of preparation. I am anxious to make an announcement to the House as soon as possible. I know of the widespread interest in the matter and I want to make sure that farmers are able to take details of the scheme into account in their plans for the forthcoming year's planting. As for the hon. Gentleman's last point, I have been listening carefully to all that has been said about grazed fallow, including the views of hon. Members.

Mr. Latham: Is it intended that when the scheme has been produced, less grain should be grown or that the same amount of grain should be grown on less land?

Mr. MacGregor: The primary objective is to deal with the problem of surpluses in cereals, but the scheme has other objectives. When farmers have to set aside 20 per cent. or more of their arable land, it will have a considerable impact on their cereal production. It may not be a full 20 per cent. in every case, but it will have a considerable impact, and less grain is the main objective.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not a sad state of affairs, with one third of the world's population wanting food, that the Common Market and the Minister are getting together to set land aside and leave it fallow? Has the Minister taken into account the fact that after a few years, when some of the land has been lying fallow for a while, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment may come along and say, "As that land has not been used for arable purposes for several years, we can make a further incursion and use it for development"?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman's last point does not arise, because normal planning considerations will apply to all land, whether it is set aside or otherwise. The hon. Gentleman will know that we have a substantial food aid programme, but it is not the answer to the problems of agriculture in developing countries and those that are short of food. Those countries' leaders themselves make it clear that they believe that the development of their own agriculture is the important requirement. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would share our concern about the cost to the taxpayer of disposing of the surpluses; hence this measure as well as others.

Fish Farming

6. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about fish farming in England and Wales.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I have recently received a request from the British Trout Association to create a development council for the trout industry and this is now being considered. I am also aware of a number of reports concerning the development of marine fish farming in Scotland.

Mr. Dalyell: Is anything to be done about the effluent and disease problem?

Mr. Gummer: We believe it to be an important part of any consideration to ensure that effluent and disease are taken fully into account. Obviously, one cannot buy increased production at an unacceptable cost. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has to take that into account, as it is particularly true of the sort of fish farming for which he is responsible.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to pay credit to the fish farming industry, which now produces 14,000 tonnes of fish a year worth £30 million and caters for 90 per cent. of the home market, which is no mean achievement? Will he also bear in mind the interests of the 3·5 million anglers in the country who are concerned about water pollution and assure the House that before the water authorities are privatised there is a legal obligation on fish farmers, who might pollute waters, to obtain water abstraction licences before further development?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the tremendous advances in fish farming and to the fact that the price of farmed fish has brought within the reach of large numbers of people products that used to be denied to them. This is a great industry and one which we want to support. I am also concerned about the effect of pollution on rivers and we have already announced that the licensing of water abstraction is to be extended to all fish farms in England and Wales. That will be part of the legislation that comes before the House.

Mr. Doran: Is the Minister aware that a considerable, if not the greater, part of research work into fish farming in this country is done at the Torry research centre in my constituency? Yesterday he sent me a letter refusing a request for the all-party group of Members with constituency interests in the fishing industry to visit the Torry research centre. Will he advise the House and those hon. Members who wish to visit the centre what exactly is going on at Torry that he wants to prevent them from seeing.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman tells only half the story. He does not mention that I gave him specific permission to visit Torry, to meet anybody whom he wanted to meet and to ask any questions that he wanted to ask. For the hon. Gentleman to suggest that I am hiding something is wholly unacceptable.

Mr. Key: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to read the excellent report of the Freshwater Biological Association and the Wessex water authority on fish stocks in the river Avon in my constituency, which has over 20 fish farms in its catchment area? Will he consider carefully their request and their recommendation for substantial further research into fish farming and the impact of pollution on that industry and the environment?

Mr. Gummer: I shall certainly consider that question. I know that much of the work done is of great importance. I also agree with my hon. Friend that the industry has to be taken extremely seriously not only in terms of its contributions to the British economy and its substitution for what would otherwise be imports but for its export potential.

Dr. Godman: I am deeply concerned about the answer that the Minister gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran). I intend to visit the Torry research station this month. I sincerely hope that I shall have the Minister's agreement to that visit.

An effluent causing great concern is that associated with the use of Nuvan 500 EC on fish farms. What information has the Minister about its use on English fish farms and, if it is used, under what regulations is it used? Will he give serious consideration to banning the use of that pesticide on fish farms?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman has asked a serious question about Nuvan. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary is looking at the issue. As far as we know, there is practically no use of that pesticide on English fish farms. I say "practically" because I do not want to say that there is no use, because it may be used—although we cannot find any evidence of it. We are looking at the issue because it must be taken seriously.

The hon. Gentleman's comment about his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) was the wrong way round. I went to great trouble to ensure that his hon. Friend could have every possible access, for the right reason that it is his constituency. When it was asked what facilities should be made available, I said that all facilities should be made available, because the centre is in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

I have never refused any sort of co-operation in any such circumstances to Opposition Front Bench Members as I am sure that the right hon. and hon. Friends of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) will agree. It is not normal for any of our institutions to be available to any group of hon. Members who happen to wish to visit them, but I try to make such institutions as available as possible. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South would have done the House a courtesy if he had admitted what I have done for him.

Bread Prices

7. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average annual increase in the price of a loaf of bread (a) between 1974 and 1979 and (b) between 1979 and 1988.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The price of bread rose on average by 14 per cent. per annum between February 1974 and May 1979. The rate of increase between May 1979 and April 1988 was 6·9 per cent.—less than half the rate during the previous shorter period.

Mr. Smith: Does my hon. Friend recall that 10 years ago the price of a loaf of bread was a major political issue as it rose inexorably year in, year out, notwithstanding Canute-like food subsidies? From the figures that my hon. Friend has given, will not most people now be able to see which side their bread is buttered and continue to vote for the party of low price inflation?

Mr. Thompson: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. The price of bread has increased by 30 per cent. since 1960 compared with the price of milk which has increased by 53 per cent. and the price of a pint of beer which has increased by 87 per cent.

Mr. Morley: Does the Minister agree that much of the top-quality grain used in bread production has been imported and is not home grown, because the bulk of the cereal grain grown in Britain is of poor quality and goes into intervention stores and attracts the subsidies that go with that?

Mr. Thompson: Because of the climate, the bulk of the grain grown in Britain is of a different quality, not an inferior quality. It is used for different purposes.

Green Pound

8. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made with attempts to devalue the green pound, following the recent meeting of the Agriculture Council.

Mr. MacGregor: Discussions are still continuing. I have made it clear to the Agriculture Council that in my view it would be right to take a measured step in the current price-fixing towards the elimination of MCAs from all products by 1992, and to remove them immediately from the pigmeat sector.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: My right hon. Friend is aware that I represent a typically inner-city constituency, but, by way of explanation, I should say that even that constituency has three splendid farms on its southern border. On behalf of that tiny minority, may I ask whether the negotiations will ensure that my three constituents and the rest of the farming community will have a fair deal? For the less initiated, how will it affect the cost of our food?

Mr. MacGregor: I assure my hon. Friend that I am seeking a fair deal for the United Kingdom farmer at the price-fixing negotiations. I made clear my intentions about the green pound from the outset of the Council discussions. This will, however, be one of the trickiest parts of the negotiations, and we have not yet seriously debated it. My hon. Friend's second point depends on whether there is devaluation and the extent of it. The impact on the retail prices index of a 1 per cent. green pound devaluation is minute.

Mr. Leigh: Will my right hon. Friend reassure the 500 farmers in my constituency that his efforts on green pound devaluation, MCA abolition and to prevent unfair subsidies abroad will result in a common agricultural policy that is truly free and fair? Our farmers are the most efficient in Europe, but they demand a free market, not a cheats' market.

Mr. MacGregor: I assure my hon. Friend that that is my objective. I think that he used the words "cheats' market" at the end of his question. That is a separate issue, but he will be aware that I am one of the Ministers taking a lead in Europe in the drive against fraud in the CAP.

Horses

9. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his answer of 5 May, Official Report, column 588, he will take steps to increase the use of horses as agricultural animals.

Mr. Gummer: It is up to individual farmers to decide how they shall use their horses as agricultural animals. I recently addressed a conference to promote what I think is a very important aspect of farming.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Britain is the only EEC country not to recognise the horse as an agricultural animal? Is he further aware of the damage that that does to racing, breeding, bloodstock, riding and driving in this country? What animal could be more agricultural than a horse?

Mr. Key: A cow?

Mr. Devlin: A chicken?

Mr. Tim Smith: A pig?

Mr. Greenway: I do not think so.

Will my right hon. Friend take steps to have the horse recognised as an agricultural animal, as it will be in 1992?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend must accept that a horse is an agricultural animal when it is an agricultural animal. When it is running in the Derby, it clearly is not an agricultural animal, and we intend to keep it so.

Pig Movements (Cheshire)

10. Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received regarding Cheshire county council's charges for pig movements.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Representations have been received from a number of individuals and organisations, including the National Farmers Union and the National Pig Breeders Association. All have expressed opposition to these charges.

Mr. Butler: Is my hon. Friend aware that Cheshire county council is continuing to charge for pig movements, and that that does not have legal status? What action does he propose to take to stop that procedure?

Mr. Thompson: I am aware of my hon. Friend's anxiety about this matter. He has been good enough to write to me about it, but I must reiterate the advice that I gave. This is a county council matter. It is for local Members of Parliament to put pressure on locally elected councillors who, all too often in this matter as in others, are ready to hide behind the Government.

Bovine Somatotropin

11. Dr. Marek: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be in a position to announce the final results of the testing of bovine somatotropin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Results of trials authorised under animal test certificates are normally submitted to the licensing authority as part of any application for a product licence. They are assessed, together with all other information submitted in support of the application, in accordance with the provisions of the Medicines Act 1968. I cannot forecast at this stage what the outcome of any application in relation to bovine somatotropin would be.

Dr. Marek: Will the Minister assure the House that when the information is available he will speedily pass it on to the public so that they are aware of BST? Will he ensure —I believe that there is cross-party support for this—that BST-treated milk is labelled as such?

Mr. MacGregor: Labelling is a separate question and depends on the outcome of applications for product licences. Two companies have applied for product licences, but the applications must be rigorously scrutinised. The difficulty about publishing the results of the trials is that all data supplied by companies in support of applications made under the Medicines Act are kept in strict confidence. The Medicines Act, under which that takes place, prohibits disclosure of the information.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. Friend's Department paying for, or otherwise supporting, any research into establishing reliable tests to show whether this hormone has been used? Surely without the existence of any such reliable tests it is quite pointless to talk about any control mechanism.

Mr. MacGregor: There is a distinction between the animal test certificate and the product licence and before issuing an animal test certificate the licensing authority, advised by the veterinary products committee, has to be satisfied that there is no risk to human health. The authority was so satisfied in the case of the applications for animal test certificates. That is why the test trials are going on. There is no scientific reason to impose conditions on the disposal of milk because we have been advised by the veterinary products committee that there is no risk to human health. That has been the outcome of tests that have so far taken place. Wider tests are now taking place in relation to animal test certificates and in due course we shall have to take a view about applications for product licences.

Raw Sugar Refining

12. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent proposals made by the European Economic Community Commission have been accepted for assistance in the refining in the United Kingdom of raw sugar imported from African, Caribbean and Pacific countries.

15. Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the European Community Commission recognises any special circumstances surrounding the refining, in the United Kingdom, of raw sugar imported from the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries; what proposals have been made to the Council of Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In this year's price fixing the Commission has proposed a Community-funded aid of about 52p per tonne which will be available to all Community pure cane refineries and which could be adjusted to take account of changes in the storage levy and in Community prices. It has also proposed authorisation for a national aid of up to about £3·28 per tonne, 25 per cent. Community funded, on ACP sugar refined in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Shersby: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government are willing to pay in full whatever percentage of the special refining aid the Commission stipulates should be at the discretion of the United Kingdom Government?

Mr. Thompson: At present we are concentrating our efforts on persuading the Council to adopt the Commission's proposals which provide for this maximum rate of national aid. We shall review our stance in the light of the decisions reached by the Council.

Mr. Page: As it has been about two years since the EC agreed to review this sugar cane refining margin, would my hon. Friend like to make a statement to the House about whether the increases will be backdated to 1 July 1987 as was originally proposed?

Mr. Thompson: Under the Commission's proposals, not yet accepted by the Council, the suggestion is that both refining aids would be backdated to 1 July 1987.

Mr. Spearing: Will the Minister confirm that, whatever the outcome of any price negotiations in any year, the commitment to 1·3 million tonnes of cane sugar is fulfillable only if the price permits the exporting Third world countres to cover their transport and refining costs in this country? Is it not therefore important that any price should enable the EC to discharge its moral commitment to those Third world countries with which it is in association?

Mr. Thompson: I know of the great interest of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) in this matter and the employment implications. I agree with all that the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Wells: Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether the cost of this extra sugar refining margin will be borne by the sugar producers or directly by the Government? Can he tell us whether we shall simply spend the money of the European Community to which we contribute 20 per cent.?

Mr. Thompson: The Community will contribute 25 per cent. and the Government will contribute the remainer.

Irradiated Food

13. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has had with consumer and similar groups about the import and export of irradiated food since the Chernobyl disaster.

Mr. Gummer: As regards exports for which I have responsibility my officials have had contact not only with a great many individual consumers, producers and exporters but with a wide range of trade associations, producer and marketing groups, and trades unions.

Ms. Ruddock: In the light of that reply, will the Minister reveal whether one of those organisations is the Asian regional office of the International Organisation of Consumer Unions, which claims that there has been deliberate dumping by Europe of contaminated food in the Third world? Will he set up an inquiry to ensure that Britain is not one of the responsible countries?

Mr. Gummer: I will look into the matter that the hon. Lady has raised. Obviously, dumping of that kind would be completely unacceptable.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what discussions he or his Department have had with other EC countries to try to establish a standard of irradiation for all food stocks when there has been an accident such as Chernobyl?

Mr. Gummer: As my hon. Friend knows, we have had a number of discussions. We have a system which will operate should any such accident take place in the future. However, we have not come to the kind of final decision that many hon. Members would like to see. I hope that the United Kingdom will continue to press for decisions based on the best scientific evidence and for proper protection for the consumer rather than rely on arguments which are sometimes merely emotional.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister accept that sheep farmers and farmers generally in Britain played a vital part in minimising the amount of contaminated irradiated food that was produced? In those circumstances, two years after Chernobyl, is it not ridiculous that there are dozens of farmers who have been affected by Chernobyl who still have not had adequate compensation for the trouble that they took at the time?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman fails to mention that £5·3 million has been paid out in compensation. The compensation arrangements were worked out step by step with the various unions and farmers were, in fact, considerably compensated. The only cases remaining are those which have specific objections to the rules laid down in agreement with the farming unions. It really is not fair to blame the Government for what has been a generous scheme.

Mr. David Nicholson: Has my right hon. Friend had his attention drawn to research from Bristol university on the effects of post-Chernobyl radiation on sheep in Somerset and Devon? Is he aware of the urgent need to reassure farmers and consumers in that area on that matter before the subject is exploited by irresponsible people?

Mr. Gummer: I am happy to tell farmers and consumers in the whole of the United Kingdom that there is no danger to human health as a result of Chernobyl. The sheepmeat that has been on sale in the United Kingdom has been wholly safe. At that time I was happy that my pregnant wife was busy eating lamb.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister not agree that the research unit at Bristol discovered the new contaminated hot spots, not so much by judgment as by luck? Is it not time that there was thorough research throughout the country to ensure that there are no other hot spots of irradiated land as a result of Chernobyl?

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has understood how the system works. He does considerable damage to cast doubt on the safety of the food that is produced in this country. I say again that no lamb has been sold in this country which could possibly be a danger to human health. We stand by that.

Home Grown Cereals Authority

14. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the chairman of the Home Grown Cereals Authority; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. MacGregor: The last time I met the chairman of the HGCA was on 13 April when he and other senior figures from levy-funded bodies came to discuss the industry funding of research in agriculture, fisheries and food.

Mr. Davis: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. In those discussions did he raise with the HGCA the possibility of the use of that research for low-cost, low-input, limited output varieties that will reduce the technological pressure on the CAP rather than exacerbate them?

Mr. MacGregor: No, because we were not discussing individual items of research. However, I know that research into that matter is going on and a good deal of it will be longer-term. Basically, we were discussing possibilities for more industry funding of near market research, to ensure that the taxpayer was getting value for money and that there were proper priorities in any Government funded research. We also want to ensure proper commercial exploitation of the research that we do. That is what the discussion was concentrating on.

Horticultural Produce (Dumping)

17. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he takes to prevent the dumping of horticultural produce on the British market.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The horticultural market in the Community is protected from dumping from third countries by the reference price system for major products and by provisions in the treaty and in Community regulations which enable the European Commission to take action to control imports.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my hon. Friend aware that strawberries from Holland have been on sale in the Bristol and Liverpool markets at 25p per lb, which is well below the cost of production? Will my hon. Friend act to prevent that dumping by using the same Common Market procedure that was successfully used a year ago by the French Government to reduce imports of Spanish strawberries in similar circumstances?

Mr. Thompson: My hon. Friend is quite correct about the disappearance of the threat of Spanish strawberries to our market. I shall look carefully at what he has told me about Dutch strawberries being imported into this country at a price which he alleges is below the production price.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Wall: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the President of Tanzania.

Mr. Wall: Does the Prime Minister accept that many young people are becoming homeless to escape violence, sexual abuse, overcrowding or because of leaving care? Will she explain how, particularly in low-paid Bradford, young people can get together the £100, plus four weeks' rent in advance, which is required by most landlords? Will she explain to Sean Coles, who is 17 years of age, receives £19·40 per week and lives and sleeps in a rubbish skip, how he is to survive in her society? Are squatting or robbing the only alternatives?

The Prime Minister: Undoubtedly some young people do leave home for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman gave, but by no means all: many leave home voluntarily. The hon. Gentleman is well aware that there have been changes in the way in which homeless teenagers are provided for financially. Under the old system, they used to get money in advance; now they get it in arrears. It is a new system. Local offices have taken special steps to inform landlords and hostels in their areas about the changes. Claimants are provided with evidence of having made a claim to help them to secure accommodation. The early indications are that landlords are beginning to adjust to the new rules.

Q2. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend welcome today's decision by the French Government to follow our lead in dealing with sub-Saharan debt? Does she agree that it is a pity that they did not respond more positively to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's initiative a whole year ago?

The Prime Minister: Yes. A number of proposals have been received about how to deal with the debt problem. They all have one thing in common. They follow the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer of nearly a year ago. I agree that it would have been better if we had had a better response at that time. I hope that we shall deal with the matter effectively at Toronto. In the meantime, I make it clear that this country has already written off £1 billion-worth of debt.

Mr. Hattersley: In the light of today's reports from the Low Pay Unit and the Child Poverty Action Group, does the Prime Minister still believe that everyone has benefited from increased prosperity during the past eight years?

The Prime Minister: I have seen briefly the summaries of those reports. The right hon. Gentleman knows that the figures that were published in May, the low-income families statistics, which are the latest statistics and cover 1981, 1983 and 1985, confirm that people at all levels of income have been getting better off. They show that those on lower incomes have done better than the population in general and that there are fewer pensioners, in proportional terms, in the lower income bracket.

Mr. Hattersley: That answer, as anticipated, dealt with the period up to 1986. Will the Prime Minister now bring her own figures up to date? Will she confirm that this year more than one million families and households are worse off by more than £3 a week as a result of the combined impact of the Budget and social security changes? Will she confirm that a total of seven million households are about to suffer a fall in their standard of living?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the Child Poverty Action Group figures referred at the latest to 1985; of course ours go beyond that. The Child Poverty Action Group figures are related strictly to the outdated method of supplementary benefit, whereas we are on a wholly new benefit system now. With regard to the new benefits, as the right hon. Gentleman is aware, some 88 per cent. of people are on either the same or an improved rate of benefit—[Interruption.] Yes some others are on a lower rate.

Mr. Hattersley: That answer may or may not be accurate. [Interruption.] It suffers from the minor deficiency of being the answer to a quite different question to that which I asked. So I ask her again, will she tell us yes or no, whether the very large number of families I quoted will be worse off as a result of the Budget? If she goes on waffling with this answer as she did with the previous one, it will reflect not only on her compassion but on her integrity as Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister: No, I will not confirm the right hon. Gentleman's figures. The Budget was an excellent one. It has helped many people on lower pay because it has increased the allowances by twice the amount of inflation. It has also reduced the standard rate of tax which, at the time when the right hon. Gentleman was in power was 33p in the pound, and is now down to 25p in the pound.

Mr. Janman: Given our long-standing commitment to the independent nuclear deterrent, our recently announced support for the European fighter aircraft programme and our continuing full implementation of the armed forces pay review body recommendations, does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's defence policies are intellectually well founded, firm and consistent, unlike the increasingly divided, indecisive and floundering policies of the Opposition?

The Prime Minister: Yes, our defence policies effectively safeguard the defence of this country and ensure that we are staunch allies of NATO, including its vital nuclear deterrent policy. I have not been able to make out the Opposition's policy. I do not believe that it has changed from having absolutely unilateral nuclear disarmament and no nuclear deterrent.

Mr. McGrady: Does the Prime Minister share my concern for the welfare for the fishermen from the County Down coast who have suffered substantial losses of tackle, catches and equipment because of submarine activity in the Irish sea? Does she also share my concern about the unhelpful response from the Ministry of Defence, which said that such losses are due to natural underwater obstacles which have the unnatural ability to drag trawlers backwards at considerable speed? Will she take some action to alleviate their plight?

The Prime Minister: Of course I am concerned about the plight of fishermen, but I do not think that I am going to get involved in this one. The hon. Gentleman must take it up with the Ministry of Defence, in which I have the greatest possible confidence.

Sir Ian Lloyd: The Prime Minister will have seen the immensely disturbing reports this morning that Cuban forces are massing on the frontier of Angola and that the South African Government are calling up reserves. In view of the immense importance to the West of South Africa as a stable country, will my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister say precisely where we stand on this matter?

The Prime Minister: Yes, of course we have seen the reports that there are a comparatively large number of Cuban forces near the Namibian border and comparatively near a very important dam. I think it is important that talks which began in London about the Angolan position are taken further. There is some dispute about where the next round of talks should take place. I think it is important that the two sides should get together and resolve that problem. I think that the Soviet Union too is anxious for it to be solved.

Q3. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jones: The Prime Minister will be aware that the Welsh Office has consulted on the need for a new Welsh language Act and that the period of consultation ended in March 1987. Two thousand responded to the call for evidence and more than 90 per cent. were in favour. Does she now think that because of the obvious demand for greater status for the Welsh language in Wales an announcement should be made? If an announcement is to be made, will it include a commitment to legislate at an early date?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the original responses were varied, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales decided to take further soundings. My right hon. Friend and the Minister of State are now considering measures to promote and protect the Welsh language, details of which will be announced shortly. There is, of course, no commitment to legislate.

Q4. Mr. Stanbrook: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stanbrook: Has my right hon. Friend seen the report of the tragic incident at a Manchester school in which an Asian boy was killed? Does she agree that that confirms that so-called anti-racist policies only strengthen race prejudice? Is it not now time for us to abandon policies which emphasise the differences between British citizens and to concentrate instead on those which promote the unity of this nation and pride in our achievements, irrespective of class, sex or race?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that everyone who settles here permanently has the same rights and responsibilities, and I welcome all genuine efforts to remove discrimination and racism.

Q5. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Williams: Was it the Prime Minister's decision to send the SAS assassination squad to Gibraltar?

The Prime Minister: We never discuss matters concerning security forces in this House.

Q6. Mr. Cran: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cran: Is my right hon. Friend aware that unemployment in my constituency of Beverley in the north of England has fallen by 22 per cent. in the past year? Is she further aware that male manual earnings in Humberside are higher than the United Kingdom average? Does that not suggest to her, that her economic policy works for the north of England as well as the south?

The Prime Minister: Yes, unemployment is falling in all regions, including Humberside which is now doing well. I agree with my hon. Friend that the overall policies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are returning enterprise to all parts.

Mr. Foulkes: Has the Prime Minister had time to read today the report of the committee on medical aspects of radiation in the environment, which points to a direct link between Dounreay and an increased incidence of leukaemia, and recommends that increased monitoring, including full body monitoring, should be carried out? Will she confirm that this increased monitoring will apply not just to Dounreay but to every nuclear establishment in Britain?

The Prime Minister: The committee on medical aspects of radiation in the environment has completed its consideration of the incidence of leukaemia in under 25-year-olds living near the Dounreay nuclear plant in Caithness and its report is published today. As my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for health in Scotland said yesterday, the Government have accepted the report and are now considering how best to implement the recommendations contained in it. The report identifies a number of possible explanations for there being six cases of leukaemia where only one would have been expected. It does not point to any particular explanation and therefore considers that all possible explanations require to be investigated further. Recommendations for these further investigations are made and are accepted.

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Powell: Is my right hon. Friend aware that her welcome and support for the success of the summit last week has been widely echoed throughout the country? Will she confirm that further rapid progress in the improvement of relations between East and West will be made possible if there is rapid success in the negotiations relating to the elimination of chemical weapons and to the reduction of the imbalance in conventional forces in central Europe?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend in welcoming the ratification of the intermediate-range nuclear weapons agreement. The next step should be to complete the negotiations on reducing United States and Soviet strategic nuclear weapons by 50 per cent. After that, as my hon. Friend pointed out, we must get on with the negotiations preferably to abolish chemical weapons and those on conventional weapons, and we now have a mandate to do that.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 13 JUNE—Until Seven o'clock, private Members' motions.

Consideration of Lords Amendments to the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill.

Ways and Means resolutions relating to the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

Progress on remaining stages of the Housing Bill.

TUESDAY 14 JUNE—Progress on remaining stages of the Housing Bill.

Motion to take note of EC documents on the limitation of the emission of pollutants from large combustion plants. Details will be given in the Official Report.

Motions on the Building Societies (Commercial Assets and Services) and the Building Societies (Limits on Commercial Assets) Orders.

WEDNESDAY 15 JUNE—Completion of remaining stages of the Housing Bill.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at Seven o'clock.

THURSDAY 16 JUNE—Progress on remaining stages of the Criminal Justice Bill [Lords].

Motion to take note of EC document on weights and dimensions of certain road vehicles. Details will be given in the Official Report.

Motion to take note of EC documents on proposals to extend roadworthiness testing. Details will be given in the Official Report.

FRIDAY 17 JUNE—There will be a debate on the growth of the tourism industry on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 20 JUNE—Completion of remaining stages of the Criminal Justice Bill [Lords].

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee: (a) HC 78-xxvii (1983-84) para 4; (b) HC 5-xviii (1984-85) para 2.

Debates on Thursday 16 June 1988. First Debate. Relevant European Community Document: unnumbered, commercial vehicles: weights.

Second Debate. Relevant European Community Documents: (a) 6878/86, (b) 7946/87, roadworthiness tests for motor vehicles and trailers.

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee: (a) HC 21-xxiii (1985-86) para 5 and HC 21-xxvii (1985-86) para 4; (b) HC 43-iii (1987-88) para 2.]

Mr. Dobson: I thank the Lord President for telling us what the business is.

I think that the whole House recognises that the Minister for Housing and Planning is having great difficulty in producing a Housing Bill that makes sense even of his own proposals. Will the Lord President accept that the intention to complete the Commons consideration of this measure next week will put an intolerable burden on the House and is likely to result in an even shabbier than normal Act of Parliament? Does he not accept that, with the Government having tabled no fewer than 183 new clauses and amendments, there is no possibility of their being properly considered? Will he seriously consider our request that further time be devoted to this Bill, even if it is only to make sure that the Bill is eventually a workable piece of legislation?

Having said all that, I must ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can tell us when we are to have the opportunity to consider the proposals on short speeches.

Turning from short speeches to the Short money, when can we expect to debate the proposals for uprating the funding of Opposition parties?

The Lord President will be aware that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has long been promising something that he refers to as the Welsh valley initiative. Can he give us an undertaking that that will be announced in the House before it is announced anywhere else?

When can we expect the oft-promised general debate on foreign affairs?

Finally, the Lord President will recall that last week I asked him if he would look into the police restrictions placed on access by right hon. and hon. Members to Downing street. I wonder whether he is in a position to make a statement on that now.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) asked me six questions about the business for next week and I shall seek to answer them in the order in which he asked them.

I understand that the Opposition are in some difficulty in respect of the Housing Bill. I believe that the time allocated is adequate, but I recognise that there is some concern. I am prepared to have discussions through the usual channels to see whether any assistance can be provided.

As to short speeches, I regret that the motion that I originally tabled could not be debated at the time that I intended. I hope to bring forward that motion again in the near future.

With regard to the Short money, the financial assistance to opposition parties, I hope that it may be possible to make an announcement about the timing of that debate in my next business statement.

I confirm that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales hopes to make a statement in the House on the valleys initiative in the very near future.

It is my intention to have a debate on foreign affairs in the very near future, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts that the precise timing is best left for discussion through the usual channels.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, he raised last week the question—as did one of his hon. Friends—of Members' access to Downing street. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department explained in a written answer on 7 June to his hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick):

> "Fresh instructions have been issued by the police to make it clear that, as hitherto, no restrictions should be placed on the number of hon. Members who need to enter Downing street in the course of their parliamentary duties."—[Official Report, 7 June 1988; Vol. 134, c. 448.]

It was most unfortunate that some right hon. and hon. Members were mistakenly prevented from entering

Downing street to present a petition. I hope that the House will accept that that was a genuine misunderstanding and nothing more. The Metropolitan police restrict access generally to Downing street in pursuance of their common law duty to prevent crime and disorder, but it has never been the intention to prevent hon. Members from pursuing their parliamentary duties.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As we have been away for a week, I will repeat a statement that I made earlier this Session. The purpose of business questions is not to make a speech about a subject of an hon. Member's choice, but to ask for a debate. In order that I may be as generous as possible in calling Members to put supplementary questions, I ask hon. Members to confine themselves to one question and not to make a speech or to expect a detailed reply.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): In view of the firm undertaking last night by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) to renationalise the Rover Group, will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on the state of the privatisation programme so that those people who work for privatised companies, or for companies which are to be privatised, may be very clear about their fate under any future Labour Government?

Mr. Wakeham: Enough was said in yesterday's debate to cause people concern about what might happen should there unfortunately be a change of Government at any future time. I should like to arrange such a debate, but I cannot promise my hon. Friend a debate in the immediate future.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): Is the Leader of the House aware of the widespread concern on both sides of the House, and outside it, at the delay in implementing the fair labelling order by his hon. Friend the Minister for Trade? Is he aware that there is widespread support for that measure, and will he give a guarantee that the order will be laid before the summer recess?

Mr. Wakeham: Consultations and discussions are going on at the moment. I shall certainly refer the hon. Gentleman's concern to my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): In view of the serious deterioration in security in Northern Ireland, will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that we have a full debate soon, keeping in mind that not one person has been made amenable to the law for the terrible massacre in Enniskillen, the 11 murders in South Down and the 17 murders in Castlederg? Will the right hon. Gentleman remember that Members from Northern Ireland can take part in debates on and move amendments to English legislation but cannot move amendments to Northern Ireland legislation?

Mr. Wakeham: Of course I recognise the concern of the hon. Gentleman on security in Northern Ireland, the grave and continuing difficulties and the need for a debate. I also recognise the concern about the way in which legislation for Northern Ireland is dealt with. Any changes in that system would be best considered in the wider context of progress towards devolved government. I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman an early debate, but I recognise the strength of what he has said and I will bear the matter in mind.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am sure that the Leader of the House accepts that the report of the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment on leukaemia clusters requires careful consideration because it raises important and serious issues. Will the House have an opportunity to discuss the report?

Will the Leader of the House also consider early-day motion 1185 in the names of myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends?

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Local Government (Direct Labour Organisations) (Competition) (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1988 (S.I. 1988, No. 956), dated 22nd May 1988, a copy of which was laid before this House on 8th June, be annulled.]

Will we have an opportunity to debate it, in the House or in Committee?

Mr. Wakeham: The second point on local government regulations in Scotland can best be discussed through the usual channels.

I note what the hon. Gentleman said about the COMARE report which has recently been published. I believe that there should be time for consideration. I cannot promise an early debate but I shall certainly bear the matter in mind.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Does my right hon. Friend agree that an early debate on defence policy would give those of us who favour multilateral rather than unilateral disarmament the opportunity to hail the unexpected but none the less welcome arrival in our ranks of the Leader of the Opposition, even if very few of his hon. Friends appear willing to follow him at this stage?

Mr. Wakeham: A debate on defence is an important part of the parliamentary year. We shall have a debate on defence, but the White Paper has only recently been published. I understand that the Select Committee on Defence is in the course of preparing a report on it. I want to have discussions as to the best time for that debate.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Has the Lord President of the Council seen early-day motion 1183 about the tragic crash of an RAF Meteor jet aircraft in Coventry on Monday 30 May and the heroism of the RAF pilot who gave his life to avoid crashing into the houses and the social club in Coventry, South-East?

[That this House notes with regret the fatal crash in Coventry of an RAF Meteor T7 jet aircraft during the Warwickshire Air Pageant on Monday 30th May; recognises that the pilot, Flight Lieutenant Peter Stacey, was a hero to give his life by crashing his plane on the only available space of open ground, between a school and two adjacent housing estates, thus avoiding turning a tragedy into a potential civil disaster; recognises that whilst air displays are a popular family entertainment, no entertainment is worth this risk to the lives of people, such as the constituents of the honourable Member for Coventry, South East who had large pieces of debris scattered onto their houses and grounds, which thankfully caused only minor damage; demands that the future organisation of such air displays be modified to ensure areas of dense population are safe from potential accidents; regards the offer by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence for the Armed Forces, in a letter to the honourable Member for Coventry, South East on 6th June, to send an advance copy of a summary of the findings of the Royal Air Force Board of Enquiry into the Meteor crash, as inadequate; and believes that for the peace of mind of the people of Coventry and the relatives of Flight Lieutenant Stacey, the investigation report should be published.]

Can the right hon. Gentleman explain why the Secretary of State for Defence has not yet made a statement to the House on the crash? Air displays such as the Warwickshire air pageant, during which the crash took place, are popular family entertainment, but no entertainment is worth such a risk to the lives of my constituents who had large pieces of wreckage scattered on their homes and gardens.

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure the whole House will share the hon. Gentleman's regret at this tragic accident. A thorough investigation is being undertaken and the results will be made public in accordance with normal practice. I am sure that is the best way to proceed, and that all of us would want to express our sympathy to the relatives of the brave pilot who was killed.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend's announcement of a debate on tourism will be welcome, but tourists need roads. When will we have a debate on motorway policy so that the north-east can be exploited to the full by tourists, who would love to get there if only the motorways were adequate? There is unanimous support for an adequate motorway system to the north-east from everyone, it would appear, except "Pimply" Heffer of The Daily Telegraph and those who advise the Minister.

Mr. Wakeham: I have answered previous questions on roads from my hon. Friend. I recognise the connection between roads and tourism. I should have thought that my hon. Friend, with his customary skill, would be able to relate the two in the debate on Friday 17 June.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Leader of the House will have seen last week's report on riots in Crowborough in Sussex. In recent years, there have been many such occurrences in more affluent parts of the country. Today, the Association of Chief Police Officers, is publishing a report about the new phenomenon of riots in so-called affluent areas. Will the Leader of the House made sure that we get a sight of the report? Will he arrange for it to be placed in the Library? We should debate the matter, if not next week, then soon, so that we can get away from the idea that the problem arises only in inner cities.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the strength of what the right hon. Gentleman has said, in view of the offices that he has held and his great experience in these matters. I shall certainly refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and see how best to meet the hon. Gentleman's request.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Although it was good of my right hon. Friend to agree to draw the attention of the relevant Minister to the question of the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) about the labelling of furs, I remind him of my early-day motion 978.

[That this House, noting the intention of the Department of Trade and Industry to introduce a labelling Order to cover the furs of animals caught in leghold traps, a device made illegal in the United Kingdom following the report of the 1951 Scott Henderson Committee, which describes it as a diabolical instrument which causes an incalculable amount of suffering, congratulates the Minister for Trade on taking this valuable step, which will allow the consumer to exercise freedom of choice as to whether or not to purchase garments the production of which will have involved extreme cruelty to animals; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to include in the Order the furs of badger, beaver, bobcat, coyote, cross fox, ermine, fisher, gray fox, lynx, marten, muskrat, opossum, otter, racoon, red fox and wolf, all of which are frequently caught in leghold traps.]

My motion has attracted close to 100 signatures from hon. Members. We should get a move on so that people can exercise real consumer freedom of choice.

Mr. Wakeham: I have seen my hon. Friend's early-day motion, and I recognise the support that it has attracted. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade wants to get on with it as quickly as he can. He is in the process of negotiations, and I shall urge him to get on with them as fast as possible.

Mr. Adam Ingram (East Kilbride): In view of the huge question mark involving alleged financial irregularities hanging over the proposed sale of the National Engineering laboratory at East Kilbride, is the Leader of the House prepared to make time available to debate that vital issue?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman time to debate the issue. If he has evidence of financial irregularities, I am sure that he knows the right way to deal with them.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the answer that he gave a moment ago, when he referred to progress towards devolved government in Northern Ireland? Will he explain why it is the Government's policy that there should be no devolved administration in Scotland or Wales but that there should be devolved administration in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Wakeham: My job is to answer questions about business for next week. I shall not indulge in a debate with my hon. Friend about that issue at present, although there are answers that can be given at the right time.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): What proportion of the legislation that the right hon. Gentleman today announced will be proceeded with next week has any application to Northern Ireland?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot give the answer to that question without notice.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the alarming rise in the offence of violence against the police, that 90 per cent. of it is alcohol-related and it is rising fastest in counties like Hampshire, where the police are thinly distributed—widely distributed—over a large area? Dos he not think that this is such an alarming trend in crime that it deserves an urgent debate?

Mr. Wakeham: Yes, of course, these are important matters. I stated to the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), that I shall discuss the matter with the Home Secretary. I confirm that I shall do that.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): As the Prime Minister has condemned trial by media, surely we should have a special debate to consider the role of press barons, bearing in mind the sort of stories that are repeatedly pumped out about public figures, including hon. Members.

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman any Government time for such a debate. Perhaps he would like to have a word with his right hon. and hon. Friends on the Labour Front Bench.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): Has my right hon. Friend noticed the growing number of parliamentary questions relating to pollution of the atmosphere, the earth, and the waters around our coast? Will he find time in the reasonably near future for a debate on pollution throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Wakeham: I noted my hon. Friend's success in obtaining the 17 May Adjournment debate on the subject of marine pollution. The Government are considering the points that he raised. It is not possible in the immediate future to have a debate on the wider issues. I shall certainly bear the matter in mind.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May we have an urgent debate next week on the Government's flagrant abuse of parliamentary procedures? The Leader of the House will be aware that the Committee considering the Housing Bill finished its consideration on 15 March. As late as last night, new clauses and new amendments, including the "White Paper", were tabled by the Government. The Government are not giving the Opposition a chance fairly to reflect our role in the House by critically examining the Government's proposals. We do not have Report stages any more; we have new Bills on Report. We need an urgent debate on the flagrant abuse of the Government's position.

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I recognise the concern. As I said to the shadow spokesman, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), I am perfectly prepared to have discussions through the usual channels on matters that are causing concern.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): In view of the proposals by Power, Water and Waste Ltd. to import millions of tonnes of festering American domestic waste into the north-west and south-west of England, will my right hon. Friend grant a debate so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can express their opposition to those proposals?

Mr. Wakeham: Of course I recognise my hon. Friend's concern. This is primarily a matter for the waste disposal authorities which are responsible for ensuring that any waste disposed of in their areas is dealt with properly and safely. I suggest that my hon. Friend gets in touch with them, but I will bear in mind what he has said.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): In view of the widespread concern about apparent unfettered exploitation by loan sharks, when are the Government going to take some initiatives to bring recommendations to the House to tighten up the laws against loan sharks?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has any particular case in mind. If he has, I suggest that he either gives me details or makes details available to the Department of Trade and Industry or to the appropriate authority. With regard to matters of financial irregularity generally, I believe that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry acts properly and swiftly in accordance with the law, which we have very much strengthened in recent years.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Earlier this week a teenage girl was killed in my constituency by a heavy goods vehicle. I believe that that was the fourth such incident in Kent this year and it throws into stark relief the importance of a debate on the whole question of road provision in Kent following the building of the Channel tunnel. Will my right hon. Friend grant a debate on that subject?

Mr. Wakeham: I am very distressed to hear what my hon. Friend has said about events in Kent. Of course, the subject of roads and the Channel tunnel is a suitable one for debate, and I wish that I could offer my hon. Friend an early date for such a debate. He will recognise the substantial increased resources that the Government have found for the road programme.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House acknowledge that in the Scottish Grand Committee this morning we received an extremely unsatisfactory reply from the Minister of State? In particular, he could not assure the Committee that there would be a separate Scottish Bill for the privatisation of electricity. Will the Leader of the House assure the House that there will be a separate Scottish Bill—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Because it is an important matter. In view of the obscure replies from the Minister of State in relation to the imports of coal for power stations in Scotland, may we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Energy to clarify the matter and give some clear sign of the state of negotiations between the South of Scotland electricity board and British Coal?

Mr. Wakeham: I have not had an opportunity to read the report of the debates upstairs and I am not sure whether I should comment on it if I had. However, I will take the opportunity to do so, and will refer the matter to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy if I think that he should take any action.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend consider giving time for an early debate on the impartiality of the BBC? Is he not particularly worried that this coming Saturday some 10 hours of air time is to be given over to an organisation that supports terrorism?

Mr. Wakeham: These are primarily matters for the BBC. The Anti-Apartheid Movement concert is not a matter for the Government. However, I should tell my hon. Friend that the Government are considering representations received in Pretoria this morning in connection with the matter.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): With his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, will the Leader of the House find time, not least in view of the unusually forthright condemnation of racial discrimination by the Prime Minister a few minutes ago, to arrange an urgent debate on racial harassment, in view of the report that was issued only yesterday by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that shows an alarming increase in London alone of 26 per cent. in this particularly unpleasant form of crime?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the concern and the force of the hon. Gentleman's argument, but I cannot promise a debate in the near future.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will not my right hon. Friend reconsider the question of the BBC's charter and its use of public money? Does he not share the widespread concern, at least on this side of the House, about the fact that the BBC is prepared to spend a large amount of its, and therefore its licence payers', money and a lot of air time on praising somebody who has been convicted of terrorism and who refuses to renounce violence?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's concern. There will be an opportunity before too long for a debate on broadcasting, but I cannot promise one immediately.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): In the time allocated next Wednesday to the discussion of a private Bill, will the Leader of the House assure us that the Bill that will be discussed will be a private Bill and that he will not be party to a meeting such as that between the Secretary of State for Transport and the outside promoter of the private Bill which became the Associated British Ports Act? We found out later that there had been collusion between the Secretary of State for Transport and that promoter. Will it really be a private Bill or will it, once again, be a front for the Government?

Mr. Wakeham: I reject entirely the hon. Gentleman's allegations in respect of my right hon. Friend. The question of private Bills is a matter for the Chairman of Ways and Means. I am quite sure that he will see to it that all proper matters are dealt with.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Will my right hon. Friend find time during the next week, or before the summer recess, for an additional Opposition day, bearing in mind the almost total lack of interest in yesterday's debate, with only 12 Labour Members of Parliament being present for the wind-up after the Rowntree debate and even fewer than that for the wind-up after the following debate?

Mr. Wakeham: I am glad to be able to assist my hon. Friend. I am sure that I shall be able to find time for an Opposition day before the summer recess, but I am not responsible for what they choose to debate or for how many Opposition Members decide to come and listen. That is a matter for them.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Could we have a debate next week, or at an early opportunity, on the National Audit Commission's report on the Property Services Agency? Then we could debate that organisation's autocratic and bureaucratic decision to stop the cross-Bradford rail link that would have been a boost for Bradford and Bradford railway services. The local passenger transport authority and the local authority want a cross-Bradford rail link to link the interchange and Bradford Forster square. A debate on the National Audit Commission's report would provide an opportunity for an investigation.

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman a debate next week on that matter, but I have no doubt that with his customary ingenuity he will find a way to raise matters that he believes to be of concern.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the growing number of problems that face civil aviation, one of Britain's most successful industries from air safety to airport capacity, from the deregulation of European air services to the computer reservation systems that are currently being studied by the Select Committee on Transport? He will no doubt be aware of the fact that many decisions on these problems will be taken by Ministers and the Civil Aviation Authority before the end of the year, without any need for primary legislation. Is it not very important, therefore, for the House to have an opportunity to debate civil aviation before the summer recess?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that considerable changes are taking place in the civil aviation industry and that it would be appropriate for the House to debate them. At this time of the year it is difficult to find days for additional debates. I am sorry that I cannot be more forthcoming about when that time can be provided.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Reverting to the Housing Bill that is to be considered on three days next week, is the Leader of the House aware that not only were four important new clauses tabled last night but that one of them, new clause 47, has the novelty of being applicable, after Royal Assent, as from today? Is this not an unusual procedure? As the Leader of the House has said that there will be discussions with the usual channels, will he withdraw his decision that consideration will be completed next Wednesday?

Mr. Wakeham: No, I cannot undertake to do that at all. I thought that I was being helpful. The time allocated for the Bill is quite substantial. I recognise that there are some difficulties, and I have undertaken to have further discussions about those difficulties. However, I cannot undertake to say in advance what the conclusions of those discussions will be.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I do not know whether my right hon. Friend has seen the announcement in today's papers about the intention of the Murdoch group, News International, to flood the country with satellite television by next year. Does he agree that the House should consider this matter and, in particular, how reasonable standards of decency and morality can be achieved and maintained when this happens, in a very short time?

Mr. Wakeham: I have seen the announcement. I should have thought that my hon. Friend would welcome the increased competition and consumer choice that the services will provide; indeed, he may well do so. As I said before, I hope that we shall be able to arrange a debate on broadcasting in general before too long, when no doubt some of these issues will be highly relevant.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we have a debate soon on the way in which many building societies and banks are blatantly in breach of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 in publishing misleading and confusing advertisements about mortgage interest rates? As that result of the mortgage war is wholly unacceptable, will the right hon. Gentleman refer the matter to the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs and seek from him an urgent statement to the House?

Mr. Wakeham: As I understand it, there are codes of practice and codes of conduct in these matters. If the hon. and learned Gentleman considers that he has evidence of improper practice perhaps he will let me have the information and I shall certainly see to it that my right hon. Friend considers it.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Having taken time to read the speech by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry yesterday in the Rowntree debate, will the Leader of the House invite the Attorney-General to come before the House? The Chancellor of the Duchy said that he had played the Rowntree takeover completely straight and that he certainly had not asked the Treasury Solicitor to approach the trustees of the Rowntree Trust. Someone must have done; somebody interfered. Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Attorney-General to come before the House and explain who exactly put the Treasury Solicitor up to interfering in the takeover bid?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that I can add anything to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy said yesterday. I shall draw to his attention the point made by the hon. Gentleman and leave it to him to decide how best to deal with the matter.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Is my right hon. Friend aware that issues concerning the implementation of the Single European Act in 1992 are now being discussed in the EEC, including the questions of monetary union and a central bank? Is he further aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer yesterday sent to the Select Committee on European Legislation a discussion paper on those matters that should have been debated but which he intends to agree in the Council of Ministers before the House has had any chance to consider the underlying issues at stake? Does not my right hon. Friend consider that it is becoming more and more urgent that the House reconsider the way in which it examines European legislation?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that there has been some concern in the House about the way in which legislation has sometimes not been considered as it was intended to be considered. My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) have been to see me about these matters. A number of EC issues are to be debated next week. I am trying to improve the situation and I shall look into the matter to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 478, which deals with the hunting of deer by packs of dogs?

[That this House deplores the increasing frequency of incidents and damage arising from the hunting of deer with packs of dogs; notes the overwhelming public opinion in support of the abolition of this unnecessary practice; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to introduce early legislation to give deer the same basic protection from cruelty as domestic and captive animals currently receive under the terms of the Protection of Animals Act 1911.]

We seek the introduction of legislation to ensure that deer are dealt with in the same way as captive and domestic animals and to give them the same rights. The early-day motion has broad support in the House and carries 132 signatures. As well as signatures of representatives of the two major political parties, it carries signatures from one of the two alliance parties—if that is not a contradiction in terms—and from the two nationalist and three Ulster Unionist parties. Will time be provided for a debate?

Mr. Wakeham: Wild deer are already protected by the provisions of the Deer Acts 1963 and 1980, which provide safeguards against abuse by poachers and against unnecessary suffering. We have no plans to introduce further legislation.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): May I, too, refer my right hon. Friend to the Prime Minister's excellent and stirring answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), in which she said in absolute terms that our citizens ought to be treated equally, irrespective of their class, sex or race? Will my right hon. Friend allow time urgently for a debate to allow the Prime Minister to explain how she squares that with the doctrine of positive discrimination enforced by her Government in the teaching of ethnic languages in schools, the allocation of building contracts in the public sector in inner-city areas and her proposals for employment in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Wakeham: When my right hon. Friend made her statement, I think that she was supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. I have no plans for a debate on that matter next week.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): May I press the Leader of the House on the subject of the promised debate on foreign affairs? May I ask that the motion be drafted to allow the House a debate about recent events in Pakistan so that we may call on President Zia to hold elections to the national assembly before 29 August and warn him that the reintroduction of powers would have serious implications and create serious difficulties in relationships between the United Kingdom and Pakistan? Will the Leader of the House give such an assurance?

Mr. Wakeham: I certainly give an assurance that I shall have discussions through the usual channels about the form of the debate so that widespread agreement can be reached as to its basis. If we have a wide debate, no doubt the hon. Gentleman will be able then to raise the points that concern him.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Before the recess, will my right hon. Friend arrange a further debate on the Civil Service to enable hon. Members such as myself whose constituencies are under threat from excessive development to urge the Government to show a lead with a massive relocation of civil servants away from Whitehall? That would benefit the economy in the south-east and in the regions and would offer better value for money to the taxpayer, who funds the Civil Service.

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that this is a big issue of concern to a number of my hon. Friends. I cannot promise an early debate, but I note that the Minister of State, Privy Council Office, who is responsible for the Civil Service, will be answering questions on Monday and it may be possible for my hon. Friend to raise the matter then.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the distribution of butter and beef which is surplus to requirements in the EEC, especially in view of the failure of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to issue tenders for the distribution and packaging of both those commodities?

Will the right hon. Gentleman sponsor my Bill to make the code of practice for publicans and tenants statutory so that Scottish and Newcastle Breweries does not evict 35 tenants in my constituency over the next few weeks?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is a persuasive arguer, but he has not persuaded me that I should necessarily sponsor his Bill. I shall refer the other matter to my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the widespread admiration of President Reagan's work for peace and for Anglo-American relations? May we have an early opportunity to discuss a suitable high honour for him?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not sure how best the House should proceed in these matters. I certainly recognise the President's contribution to world peace and I shall perhaps talk to my hon. Friend about what he has in mind.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): Has the Leader of the House noted the large number of early-day motions dealing with badger protection—in particular early-day motions 843, 1091 and 1173?

[That this House notes with concern that Her Majesty's Government has no plans at present to legislate for the protection of badger setts; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to initiate suitable amendments to the Badger Act 1973 and the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1987 so as to afford protection to badger setts as a matter of urgency.]

[That this House condemns the practice of badger baiting in Britain; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, to protect their setts.]

[That this House condemns the abhorrent practice of badger baiting, as recently depicted on the Central Television programme, The Cook Report, and calls on the Government to amend the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, to protect badger setts, increase magistrates' courts' powers to impose heavier fines on convicted offenders, consider increasing the maximum prison sentences for the offence from six months to two years for persistent offenders and make liable those landowners whose employees in pursuit of their employment deliberately kill badgers or disturb setts on their land.]

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a recent television programme dealing with the matter showed quite clearly that this abhorrent practice regularly occurs in Britain? Will he find time for a debate on this practice so that we may see an end to it as quickly as possible?

Mr. Wakeham: The Government share the abhorrence expressed in early-day motion 1173 but doubt whether additional measures could reasonably be taken that would significantly increase the protection already afforded to badgers under the existing law.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): May I respectfully request the Leader of the House to reconsider his answers to my hon. Friends about the Housing Bill? That Bill was considered for a long time in Committee, longer than the poll tax Bill and longer than the Education Reform Bill but, at the eleventh hour, over 160 Government amendments have been tabled. Yesterday, guidelines were published transferring local authority housing to the private sector, which undercut provisions in the Bill.

The impression is being created that the Bill is being marginalised in terms of the debate in the House by being put on at the tail-end of Monday's business and, as a result, there will not be sufficient time properly to consider the provisions that the Government have now brought before the House. May I ask the Leader of the House at least to reconsider the timetable, or preferably withdraw the Bill, even at this late stage, until the Government have a coherent policy?

Mr. Wakeham: I told the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends that I would have further discussions. I hope that he does not want me to reconsider that, because I would have thought that that was a helpful response. That is the way forward, and there is nothing more that I can add to what I have already said.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did the Leader of the House hear the Speaker yesterday respond to me when I asked the Secretary of State for the Environment to come to the House to be questioned on the new planning procedures as they affect opencast mining applications up and down the country? Since the Leader of the House has an aversion to the earthmoving equipment trampling all over his constituency, perhaps he will understand why there are serious objections to large-scale opencast mining applications being allowed on the basis of new criteria on marketing and commercial viability.

Will the Leader of the House ask the Scretary of State for the Environment to answer questions on this matter and organise a debate so that everybody can take part? Will he point out to the Secretary of State that if the planning application system is allowed to carry on it will result in large incursions into green belt planning procedures and will be used in all sorts of ways up and down the country?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will answer any questions that it is proper for him to answer, if the hon. Gentleman tables them. I notice that there may be a debate on Monday and, with the hon. Gentleman's customary ingenuity, he might be able to get a speech in order that would enable him to express his concerns.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Lord President of the Council give us a guarantee that, in the debate next week on pollution caused by combustion, it will be possible to discuss the pollution caused by the combustion of toxic waste, especially in view of the threat of hundreds of tonnes of toxic waste from Switzerland, which has been rejected by almost every country in Europe and Africa, being brought to Re-Chem in Pontypool? If that is not possible, will he give a guarantee that in the near future we will be able to discuss the matter raised by the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) that waste already at Pontypool has come from more than a dozen countries and that we are importing some of the deadliest substances known to mankind for incineration in a way which, if it became defective, would present a great peril? Is it right that Britain is becoming the dustbin for the waste that the rest of the world has rejected?

Mr. Wakeham: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be able to get the points he wants to make in order for the debate next week. Whether he can do so is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, not for me. If he does that, the rest of his question is hypothetical.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Will the Leader of the House give us an assurance that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will bring forward at an early opportunity the final draft regulations, originally announced in February, for the banning of standard polyurethane and high resilience foams? Will he give a further assurance that the regulations will take account of the phasing out and banning of the sale of secondhand furniture containing dangerous materials with toxic fumes that will kill and incinerate people within three minutes? It is essential that the proposals are brought before the House before the summer recess so that by February next year it will be a criminal offence to sell such obnoxious products. There are still companies on the high street advertising combustion-modified foam as a safe foam when the Government have already announced that it will be a criminal offence to sell such foams. That is a highly irresponsible act especially when, as I have said, it will be a criminal offence by February of next year.

Mr. Wakeham: I give the hon. Gentleman the undertaking that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will consider the points made and all the representations made to him on this important subject. At this stage I cannot give him a firm undertaking about when the orders will be laid.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Would it not be educative next week for the Leader of the House's colleagues no less than mine if, in the light of early-day motions 1142 and 1156 and in the light of Robert Harris's full-page article in Sunday's The Observer, to have a debate on how No. 10 Downing street now operates? In particular, would it not be helpful to have an explanation next week as to why, on 17 May, the Secretary of State for Education and Science threw a protective smoke-screen around the role of No. 10 Downing street and resorted, uncharacteristically for him, to carefully considered personal abuse and, as transpires from the unchallenged leak of his Civil Service brief, to what looks like calculated deceit of the House?

[That this House notes that the Guardian of Friday 20th May carried an article entitled 'Thatcher's boy in a cleft stick', which stated that according to Foreign Office sources 'Mr. Charles Powell wants Washington or Paris nothing less, but he's not going to get either of them', and that Mr. Powell had been offered and turned down the post of Ambassador in Stockholm, and that the article added 'Powell has another string to his bow: he knows where the bodies are buried in the Westland Affair. He escaped appearing before a Select Committee, but not their sharpest criticism for his orchestrating rôle in the leaking of a letter from the then Solicitor General, which ultimately resulted in the then Secretary of State for Defence's resignation'; expresses its concern that knowledge of wrong-doing by the Prime Minister is alleged to put Mr. Powell in a position to obtain an Embassy more senior than his status warrants; asserts that this is not in keeping with the high moral ground claimed by the Prime Minister; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to make a statement.]

[That this House calls on Her Majesty's Government to set up an inquiry into the SAS operation in Gibraltar, to address itself to the questions as to whether the Joint Intelligence Staff, through its current intelligence groups, was responsible for preparing assessments of the situation in Spain and Gibraltar prior to the shooting, if so, as to how many assessments were made and on what days, as to whether the Joint Intelligence Committee, in any form, considered these or other assessments or reports on the matter, if so, as to when it did so and whether it was as a full committee, a sub-committee or by the chairman alone, as to whom advice was offered by the Joint Intelligence Committee, as to whether the Permanent Secretaries' Committee on the Intelligence Services was involved in considering or formulating assessments or advice, and, if so, on what occasions, as to on what occasions advice or assessments were offered to the Prime Minister by the Permanent Secretaries' Committee on the Intelligence Services, the Joint Intelligence Committee, MI5 or Sir Colin Figures, as to who, or which committee, proposed the use of the SAS, as to whether the SAS was ordered to operate in Gibraltar under pre-existing rules of engagement, or as to whether specific Rules of Engagement were drawn up, as to on what occasions, in the 72 hours prior to the shooting, the Prime Minister was apprised of the sequence of events in Gibraltar, and on what occasions, over the same period, she issued instructions or agreed actions in relation to the events, and as to what consultation she undertook with the Overseas Policy and Defence Committee of the Cabinet.]

Mr. Wakeham: I believe that the business I have announced for debate next week will be a more profitable use of the House's time than the suggestions made by the hon. Gentleman, in a spirit of helpfulness.

Orders of the Day

Housing Bill

[First Day]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

4.16 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask you to consider as carefully as you are able the way in which the Government are legislating on the hoof? There are no fewer than 183 new clauses or amendments being added to the Bill, many of them at short notice. I accept that some are in response to our requests in Committee, but that is not a good enough reason for introducing completely new measures that were not even debated in Committee.

It is extremely important because, as you will know, Mr. Speaker, Standing Committees are set up to look into the way in which legislation is made, not just in areas of disagreement but in areas of agreement. The idea behind that has always been that the Committee procedure should lead to detailed investigation so that we achieve better legislation and avoid the danger of unintended consequences, which is a common problem in the House. In spite of that, some important changes are being made to the Bill.

A social landlord charter has been announced and it was supposed to be debated in the House. It was announced yesterday by the Minister in a speech. I have still not received a copy of that speech, even though his office told me that it would send me one. The Government have also announced that another amendment on housing associations will be introduced, even while the Bill is on Report. That amendment will affect security of tenure, the tenants' charter and the right-to-buy for housing associations. That has not even been mentioned in the House but it is apparently to be introduced.

An entirely new part of the Bill is being announced on Report involving a housing corporation for Wales. I am not opposed to that, but, as you will have seen, Mr. Speaker, the legislation involved is complex and detailed. There was no explanation in Committee from the Secretary of State for Wales and we did not have a Welsh representative on the Opposition Front Bench, although there was a Back-Bench Member from Wales representing each party.

This is not the way to legislate. In the amendments and new clauses the Government are changing legislation that is passing through the House. For example, they refer to the Housing (Scotland) Act, but that measure is not yet an Act of Parliament.

New clause 47 would dispose of council housing stock and undermine clause 4 of the Bill. It would have a dramatic effect on homelessness but, above all—I place great emphasis on this—it is retrospective legislation. The new clause takes effect from 9 June 1988—today. We shall not be debating it until next week. The Minister cannot claim that it is a new measure because the other day he put in the Table Office a document of about seven or eight pages which states what it is intended to do. Clearly, the Government have been thinking about it for some time, but this is the first time that we have had news of it.

I am sorry to delay the House, but it is an important point of order. It is so important to the procedures of the House that we felt it essential to bring it to your notice, Mr. Speaker, to put pressure on the Government to stop them legislating on the hoof. If they cannot get their act together and decide who is the housing Minister, they should give more time to ensure that we have a Housing Bill that meets the needs of our people.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask hon. Members to allow me to deal with the matter. I have not selected the motion for recommittal for debate and I listened to what the Leader of the House had to say about the matter. I am sympathetic to the points and requests for more time made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), but it would be best to proceed today and see how we get on next week in terms of time.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Our concern about the late appearance of substantial new clauses and amendments is that it is impossible for Oppostition parties or Government Back Benchers to table further amendments in the knowledge of what the Government are doing. We are likely to be caught by the publishing tomorrow of amendments that the Government wish to introduce—whether it be by press release or in other documents—to amend major parts of the Bill that will be debated later. There will be no opportunity for us to debate those amendments because the time allocated for such debate will have passed.

At the beginning of the Report stage there is a proposal that the Bill should not follow the usual order of debate. It is proposed that it be taken in the sequence of the Bill rather than in the sequence of new clauses—starting with Government new clauses—and amendments to them. I have heard that the reason for that may be that the Government believe that, by delaying consideration of a new clause or amendment, they may be able to defeat a proposal from their own Back Benchers that they do not wish to take early on. Whatever the reasons, the lack of opportunity for ordinary Back Benchers to reconsider matters, and the fact that matters have taken an unexpected turn today, mean that there is additional reason for asking, in the presence of the Leader of the House, for reconsideration of the timetable.

We could deal with certain matters today—I do not believe that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) dissents from that—and there should be a further delay so that we know exactly what the Government intend before we consider the Bill further.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Are the points of order concerned with the same matter? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] I shall take them, but I ask hon. Members to make brief points of order because I doubt if they are points of order for me but questions of time for the Bill.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that a number of the amendments refer to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988, which does not exist. The Housing (Scotland) Bill has yet to have its Report stage in another place.

May I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to one or two new clauses and amendments that have been tabled by Ministers? New clause 47 includes not only the Secretary of State for the Environment but the Secretary of State for Scotland and specifically amends Scottish housing legislation. As the Housing (Scotland) Bill is before the House, it is open to the Government to amend that Bill on Report in another place and for us to consider those Lords amendments. Is it in order for the Government to use this ostensibly English—and now Welsh—Bill to deal with Scottish housing legislation?

Mr. Speaker: There is no time limit on the Bill, so it would be sensible for hon. Members to put their questions to the Minister when we reach the amendments or new clauses. I cannot give explanations; that is a matter for the Government to answer.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend made some important remarks regarding Wales. New schedule 240 is 180 lines long and new schedule 241 is 400 lines long. Why has this arrogant, high-handed attitude been taken to Wales, and is it not wrong to spring this complicated matter on the House?

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as the guardian of Back Benchers' rights, to consider my point of order regarding the issuance of the Government's guidelines on the large-scale voluntary transfer of local housing. In Committee in the first week of March, I specifically asked the Minister for Housing and Planning about the Government's response to the initiatives of Cardiff city council and Cŷngor Bwrdeistref Ynys Môn in relation to the large-scale voluntary transfer of housing associations. The Minister said that it was purely for local authorities to make their bids. There was no mention in Committee of the possibility of the Government issuing a guideline document. How can it be right for the Government in Committee to table amendments on matters that were first raised by the press? If there was no possibility of debating the matter then, how can we debate it now when the document was issued only last night—the day before the Report stage?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is a convention of the constitution that Parliament strives to avoid retrospective legislation where possible, although there might be odd occasions when it is necessary. It is up to you, Mr. Speaker, to bear that in mind when you make your selection, as I am sure you do.

The Housing Finance (Special Provisions) Act 1975 proposed to give retrospective support to Clay Cross councillors. You, Mr. Speaker, may recall that Conservative Members stood up in unison and said that retrospective legislation was terrible and was the slippery slope on the road to Fascism. It is proposed that new clause 47 will be effective from today, but it will not be debated until next week and will not receive Royal Assent for several weeks. The Bill, therefore, is bound to be retrospective in that clause alone. The way in which the Government have tabled it shows that they are deliberately proposing retrospective legislation, which is unnecessary. This is a narrow and shadowy matter, but should not the conventions of the constitution be given consideration? Will you, Mr. Speaker, assure the House that, with retrospective legislation, you give consideration to preserving the constitution and preventing us from sliding down what Conservative Members described 14 years ago as the slippery slope to Fascism?

Mr. Speaker: When the hon. Gentleman looks at my selection he will see that I have born those matters very much in mind. The selection has been generous.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is self-evident that there is an exceptional number of Government amendments, Government new clauses and new schedules. You, Mr. Speaker, did not have the advantage of serving on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill. Many of the amendments appear in response to a number of suggestions made by Labour Members. Can you confirm that all the amendments and all the new clauses and schedules tabled by the Government are perfectly in order in terms of the time limit laid down by Standing Orders? Does it not lie ill on the lips of the Opposition to protest about the tabling of amendments, new clauses and schedules which have all been tabled precisely within the time limit?

4.30 pm

Mr. Speaker: I did not have the advantage of serving on the Committee. I understand that some of the amendments are concessions. Some other matters are perhaps new to the Bill, and that was the point raised earlier with the Leader of the House. He has said that he will again look at the matter of timing. I do not think that there is much more we can do about that now.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no time limit on the amendments and when the Minister comes to them he could be asked about what they mean and could give his explanation in the ordinary way. It is not a matter for me to answer.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I have two points of order, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps I could ask you to dispose of the first before I put the second. I was not a member of the Standing Committee. I have served on many Standing Committees that adjourned when statements were made outside the House by Ministers about prospective new clauses. You will know that today there appeared in the Vote Office what purports to be a White Paper about new clauses tabled last night and in particular new clause 47. This means that after Monday we will not be able to table amendments to new clause 47. Therefore the notice for consideration of these matters is short.

I understand what you, Mr. Speaker, have said about what the Leader of the House said. My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has properly used his procedural rights to put down a motion that the whole Bill be recommitted to the Standing Committee. For reasons about which we can speculate but which, of course, we accept, you have not selected that. You will know that in "Erskine May" there is provision for the committal of part of a Bill. I could not have seen new clause 47 or its sisters, new clauses 45 and 46, until about 9 o'clock this morning, and I do not think that any other hon. Member could practically have been expected to do any better than that.

[Mr. Nigel Spearing]

For that reason it was not possible for me either to add my name to the motion in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith or to put down any other motion for today's Order Paper or today's sitting. Would it be in order and would you now consider, Mr. Speaker, a manuscript amendment that new clauses 44 to 47 be recommitted to the former Committee on the Housing Bill? If you feel that you cannot accept that, perhaps you could accept a manuscript amendment that new clause 47 be recommitted, partly because of its nature but particularly because of the retrospective effect from today that has already been well put to you by me and by my hon. Friends. That is my first point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has said that he would like a ruling on that first. It would be in order to put down a motion, but I would not accept a manuscript amendment today because, as the hon. Gentleman will see from the Order Paper, I have not yet selected the new clauses.

Mr. Spearing: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. With great respect, on page 2 of this very long selection list at the end of group 4 there is listed Government amendments Nos. 42 to 47—I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. I incorrectly assumed that the selection list was for the whole of the debate on the Bill, but I see that it is for the first day only.

Mr. Speaker: I think I can help the whole House. We should proceed with today's business. The Leader of the House has said that he will look at the timetable. I fully understand and I am sympathetic to the points being made about new clauses that have been put down fairly recently. However, the Leader of the House has said that he will look at that and there is nothing else that I can do now about the matter. In any case, we shall not reach them today.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Some of us who sat for 180 hours on the Housing Bill are celebrating our first anniversary in this place. During the past year the Government have shown an increasing tendency to misuse the Report stage as a Committee stage and to table amendments in a fashion that curtails the rights of Back Benchers. The issue is not simply about time but about the individual rights of hon. Members. I look to you, Mr. Speaker, to protect and safeguard those rights because we are thoroughly sick and tired of being misused and abused.

I sat on the Committee for 180 hours—longer than the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who turned up on occasions. We tried to persuade the Minister to deal with the matter and we did it in a way that should have given the Government an opportunity to improve the legislation.

I was given categorical assurances about amendments that would improve the Bill and meet my feelings about it. The Government have chosen to ignore the guarantees given to me and to other Back Benchers. The issue is one of principle and it is for you, Mr. Speaker, to sort it out. If it is not sorted out, the Government will be given the green light to use between now and the end of this Session, the Report stage to abuse the House and the rights of hon. Members. For that reason I implore you to look at this matter and to give serious consideration to the request by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) who asked for the matter to be taken back to the Committee so that hon. Members such as I may have an opportunity to consider the amendments proposed by the Government and to protect our rights.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask how the actual selection works? You have listened to the points made by my hon. Friends and you will clearly understand the distress that we feel. We were in a Committee that finished on 15 March and now find ourselves confronted by vast quantities of new clauses and amendments. Despite what the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) says, those matters were not discussed in Committee and nor were they the subject of requests made by us.

We accept that some of the amendments arise out of undertakings given by Ministers, but if the hon. Member for Eastbourne reads them he will see that many of them relate to completely new business. As I say, the Committee finished on 15 March and last night new business was still being tabled and a great wedge of clauses and new amendments came out on Tuesday. That does not give us a chance to operate effectively as an Opposition.

When one looks at all the new Government business that is put forward, one sees that Report stages are not being treated like proper Report stages. We came back to the House to report the changes that we made to the Bill that went to Committee after Second Reading, but this is a completely new Committee stage. In many cases it will be treated by some hon. Members as a re-run of Second Reading since we will be discussing some fairly broad principles. When you see this happening, Mr. Speaker, and when you see the amendments that have been put down by the Government, surely you should say that you are not prepared to select these amendments on Report because as Mr. Speaker you are not giving the House a fair opportunity to consider these matters.

Mr. Speaker: I am not having that. If the hon. Gentleman says that I should not select the amendments there is no opportunity for them to be debated. I am sure that he does not mean that. I have made a very generous selection and the hon. Gentleman has only to look at the selection list to know that that is true. I think that we should get on with these amendments, which have been tabled for some time.—[Interruption.] There is no argument about them. They have been tabled long enough for hon. Members to prepare their amendments and speeches.

What we are concerned about and what I am concerned about is what will happen next week. The Leader of the House has already said that he will look into that.

I am going to call the motion.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): On a point of order——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: No. I must put the order of consideration motion.

Motion made, and Question put,

That the Housing Bill, as amended, be considered in the following order, namely, Amendments relating to Clause 1, Schedule 1, Clauses 2 to 7, Schedule 2, Clauses 8 to 22, Schedule 3, Clauses 23 to 37, Schedule 4, Clauses 38 to 43, New Clauses 25, 26 and 27, New Schedules 240 and 241, Amendments relating to Clauses 44 to 57, Schedules 5 and 6, Clauses 58 to 71, Schedule 7, Clauses 72 and 73, Schedule 8, Clause 74, Schedule 9, Clauses 75 to 99, Schedule 10, Clauses

100 to 108, Schedule 11, Clauses 109 to 114, Schedule 12, Clause 115, remaining New Clauses and New Schedules, Amendments relating to Schedule 13—[Mr. Ridley.]

The House divided: Ayes 231, Noes 176.

Schedule 1

Tenancies Which Cannot be Assured Tenancies

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Ian Grist): I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 75, line 41, at end insert—

'(2) The reference in sub-paragraph (1) above to the case where the interest of the landlord belongs to Her Majesty in right of the Crown does not include the case where that interest is under the management of the Crown Estate Commissioners.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 61.

Mr. Grist: Both are straightforward amendments. Properties let by the Crown Estates Commissioners, like those let by the Chancellors of the Duchies of Cornwall and Lancaster, are to be brought within the scope of the assured tenancy regime although Crown properties are, of course, generally outside the scope of the Bill. The Crown Estate Commissioners and the Duchies were brought within the scope of the Rent Act 1977 by the Housing Act 1980. The Duchies' interests are already covered by clause 43. Government amendment No. 9 applies the assured tenancy regime to lettings by the Crown Estate Commissioners.

Government amendment No. 61 is a technical amendment. As the Duchy of Lancaster will be letting on assured tenancies, it is necessary to deem that the Chancellor of the Duchy shall be the owner of Her Majesty's interests for the purpose of those tenancies. That is because Her Majesty cannot be sued in the event that legal action should arise. I am sure that hon. Members will accept that the amendments are uncontroversial and necessary.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The amendments are uncontroversial in one sense, but it would be convenient if the Minister could tell the House how many properties are affected in England, Scotland and Wales, because for the people in question the amendments are clearly important although the percentage of the total stock that is affected is small. How many properties and tenants are we talking about?

Mr. Grist: I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman off the cuff but I shall certainly try to find out the answer for him.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. We have just had a vote on the order of consideration motion, but the Minister cannot answer the first question that he has been asked about the first amendment. It is an absolute shambles—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat. Answers given by Ministers have nothing to do with the Chair. We now come to Government amendment No. 70——

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. As you are aware, a considerable number of points of order were raised with Mr. Speaker about the generally unsatisfactory nature of the Bill as it comes to the House on Report, and about the late tabling of amendments. Many of my hon. Friends have made the point that the House as a whole is now being expected to give Committee stage consideration to these amendments rather than the normal Report stage reconsideration. It seems farcical that we are faced with a situation in which an hon. Member, not of my party, asks a perfectly reasonable question about the number of tenancies affected by the very first amendment but the Minister apparently does not have the faintest idea. That seems to reduce our proceedings to a farce. The object should be to allow hon. Members to find out the background, the justification and how many people are involved—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that I can deal with this. I understand the frustration felt by hon. Members, but I must remind the House that the Chair is not responsible for answers given by Ministers. Perhaps the point that has been made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) from the Opposition Dispatch Box has gone home to those in all parts of the House. We must now proceed with Government amendment No. 70.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South) rose——

Mr. McCartney rose——

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I call the Minister to move Government amendment No. 70.

Ms. Primarolo: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Opposition Members raised earlier with Mr. Speaker the point that new information is before us and that, as Back Benchers, we have been unable to consider that information properly in order to debate the Bill. Mr. Speaker advised us that Ministers would answer our questions during the debate. However, on the very first amendment and on the very first question asked, the Minister told us—he was not even on the Committee—that he could not answer the question. What faith can we have in the proceedings on the rest of the Bill?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House cannot go on rehearsing and repeating points which have already been made and which, in effect, are not points of order. We must now proceed with the amendments, which, I repeat, have been before the House and all its Members for some time. It would be to the advantage of everybody concerned to proceed with the amendments.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Boateng: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I appreciate your predicament in this matter and do not seek to go beyond your rulings but I am bound to say that in Committee we were used to the somewhat cursory comments from the Front Bench of the Minister of State's acolyte who never departed from her script. Much of the Bill that we considered in Committee has been dispensed with—like, apparently, the services of the Minister who considered the matter in Committee. Is it really in order for this matter to be dealt with by the Minister of State's new acolyte in this way? We ask ourselves, "Where is Marion Roe?"

Madam Deputy Speaker: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's sympathy for the Chair, but I assure him that I am in no predicament. I call the Minister to move Government amendment No. 70.

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 70, in page 76, line 14, at end insert—

'(cc) the Broads Authority'

I was going to say, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is that the lettings are for the future so the number is hypothetical anyway.

The Broads Authority was established for the Norfolk and Suffolk Broads earlier this year. For housing purposes it is treated as a local authority. It is intended that its small housing stock should be let on secure tenancies, not assured tenancies. The amendment adds the Broads Authority to the list of bodies in schedule 1, the lettings of which cannot be assured tenancies.

Mr. Soley: We are glad to know that the tenancies will not be shorthold tenancies in that context. However, in view of the Minister's unfortunate contribution to the debate so far, I advise him that the whole essence of this afternoon has been the Government's inability to get their act together in relation to the Bill. We need detailed answers, given that to some extent the Government seem to have accepted that the Bill is now being drafted on the Floor of the House. Let me put the Government on notice that we expect to have answers to reasonable questions. We do not expect to have dismissive answers. If, in some circumstances understandably, the Minister does not have a complex answer to hand, we expect to hear from the Minister and to be given an answer in due course. Otherwise, the Bill will not only be an appalling mess, but it will be a very long and very bitter, nasty mess.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On what should be relatively short and uncomplicated matters, the figures are very important. In the same schedule, one of the excepted authorities is the Inner London education authority. The House might believe that the ILEA owns no houses apart from those lived in by school teachers, but that is not correct. Several people who are tenants of the ILEA live near me. It was several months, if not years, before I could discover how many properties in Southwark and Bermondsey not attached to school or education premises were owned by the ILEA. The amendment does not concern my constituency. It is about the Broads. None the less, I am sure that the same question is relevant. How many people will be affected by being in one category of tenancy rather than another? The whole debate is about what tenancies and what rights people will have.

Like the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), I hope that whenever we consider proposals—they are all new Government amendments—to put into the Bill or take out of the Bill a category of housing we shall be told how many properties are involved. However small the geographical area, it is a fundamental change for the people in question. Repeatedly in the Bill we have discussed what for many tenants will be the most fundamental change in their status relative to their landlords since the war. I ask again, and I give notice that I will do so on each similar amendment, how many properties and how many tenants are involved.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): It may come as a surprise, but I have not always agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. As I understand the Bill, and as I understand what the hon. Member for Hammesmith (Mr. Soley) said when he talked about 99 if not 100 concessions being made, the concessions which many of us have heard about today are profound concessions that hon. Members on both sides of the House welcome. Surely those concessions were made because the Secretary of State and his team listened to what has been said and listened to the worries that people have had. That will make it a better Bill.

Is it not right that, even if the Opposition do not like the Bill, it is the will of the country and the will of the Government that the Bill will prevail in the end? Is it not their task to see that it is a better Bill and to discuss the very proper concessions that have been made? Are we not better to move on in that attitude, instead of in the manner of people who think that they still run the country when they do not?

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): The assumption is being made that the amendment that we are now considering and the other Government amendments that have been tabled, some at great length, are the result of concessions granted to the Opposition. In Committee we were granted a large number of concessions, or given assurances about a large number of matters, which we saw as concessions.

The great tragedy for us, and for people in this country, is that the Government amendments, new clauses and new schedules do not reflect the concessions and undertakings given in Committee. If they did, we would be very happy and we would not be complaining. However, they are quite different. They represent the Government's rewriting of the legislation and the final gestation of a dispute between Ministers and civil servants in the Department of the Environment. It is obvious from the length of time between finishing Committee and reaching Report and the panic over the way that the Government have tabled amendments that there have been major problems in the Department of the Environment which have resulted in amendments being tabled in a way that treats the House with contempt. As we discuss Government amendment after Government amendment, the Opposition will point out how concessions which seemed to be granted and agreed in Committee have been ratted on and we shall table amendments to make sure that the Government's promises in Committee are put before the House in the form of Opposition amendments.

Mr. McCartney: I should like to ask the Minister a question about his statement. I heard him say that the Broads Authority will be treated like a local authority. At about 8 o'clock this morning I received a copy of what loosely could be called a White Paper entitled:

"Large Scale Voluntary Transfers of Local Authority Housing to Private Bodies".

I had a cursory look at it. Will the Minister confirm that the Broads Authority will be treated like a local authority and will be included in the concepts set out in that White Paper? If so, has the Broads Authority been advised of the contents of the White Paper and what procedure will be used to consult the tenants of the Broads Authority in respect of the possibility of their homes being transferred to the private sector by the Broads Authority?

Mr. Spearing: I was not a member of the Committee and therefore I approach these matters as an amateur. That does not mean that the Minister does not have the responsibility to make things absolutely clear. As I understand it, an assured tenancy is a new form of legal tenure which has much less security for the tenant than he has at the moment. Even what is described as a secure tenancy in another part of the Bill is not as secure as such tenancies are at the moment.

I understand that schedule 1, to which the amendment applies, defines tenancies which cannot be assured tenancies. Therefore, I assume that they are tenancies which, whatever happens to the property, will remain secure tenancies whether they remain with a local authority or whether the local authority disposes of them in the way in which the Government wish.

The amendment is adding to the list of local authorities, on page 76 of the Bill, the Broads Authority, which does not yet exist. The House has passed a Bill creating the new Broads Authority. Informal discussions are taking place, and I believe that the county clerk of Norfolk county council is about to call a number of meetings in which policies are to be discussed and the authority will take over next year.

If the Broads Authority is added to the list and becomes a local authority for the purposes of the Bill, presumably it will be subject to the Government's policy of disposal, including the policy of disposal encapsulated in new clause 47 which is on the list of amendments and is therefore important in the debate. Will the Minister tell me whether I am correct in saying that, by adding to tenancies that cannot be assured the tenancies of the future Broads authority, if that authority used the future facilities of the Bill, it could sell off property? Indeed, the Government say that the future Broads Authority, inheriting tenancies and ownership of property, can, if it wishes, come to an arrangement with another landlord under new clause 47, or with anyone else, and sell it off. Therefore, they say, if it is sold it must retain secure tenancies and not assured tenancies.

Is the Minister saying that the servants of the Broads Authority—which has hardly got going, and which is an important new authority in the administration of a novel sort of national park—who will be in occupation of property, the ownership of which will be visited on the Broads Authority, might have their property sold under them? The implication is that, although that may happen, they will remain secure tenants, but the property will be sold. In answering this short debate, which may be less important than others, will the Minister say whether that is correct?

Does the Minister envisage that the Broads Authority will be able to sell or to transfer tenancies to charitable organisations as defined in new clause 47? If that were the case, tenants would remain secure, but the ownership would be transferred.

Mr. Grist: For housing purposes the Broads Authority is treated like a local authority, so it comes under exactly the same rules as a local authority. In the terms of this small amendment, these tenants are secure tenants and the terms of the amendment mean that they remain so. I would have thought that that would be welcomed by Opposition Members.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Will the Minister answer the question put by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes): how many tenants and properties will be affected by this?

Mr. Grist: I said "few" when I opened this little debate.

Amendment agreed to.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Mr. William Waldegrave): I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 77, line 17, leave out 'sub-paragraph' and insert 'paragraph'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 11 to 13.

Mr. Waldegrave: These are intricate amendments relating to the resident landlord provisions of the Bill. They derive from a particular case, about which there has been regular correspondence since 1974 between a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) and the Department.

Lettings by resident landlords—that is, people who let part of their homes—are not assured tenancies. Under the Bill they are not subject to statutory security of tenure or to rent control. Many of these restrictions were removed as long ago as 1980. Paragraphs 18 to 20 of schedule 1 ensure that a letting which has been made by a resident landlord does not become assured during certain periods when there there is no landlord in residence in the building.

Amendment No. 11 covers the case in which there is a change of landlord, a new landlord gives notice that he intends to occupy the dwelling within six months or, within that period, another resident landlord moves in or the landlord's interest becomes vested either in trustees with the beneficiary moving into the dwelling or in the owner's personal representatives following his death. During the intermediate period, when no landlord is in residence, the tenancy does not become assured.

Amendments Nos. 12 and 13 deal with the case when the landlord's interest is vested in trustees and the beneficiary under the trust who has been living in the dwelling dies. The tenancy will not become an assured tenancy in any period up to two years while the landlord's interest remains vested in trustees until a new beneficiary moves in.

Mr. Allan Roberts: This seems to be an interesting but somewhat convoluted amendment.

Mr. Waldegrave: That means that the hon. Gentleman does not understand it.

Mr. Roberts: It means exactly that. That is why I am on my feet asking the Minister to explain it further so that we can decide whether we agree with it. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) understands it, I will be surprised. What I do understand is that one of the proposals gets rid of the protection that might exist for some tenants who are living in property where the landlord is not resident.

If I understood the Minister correctly, he said that if a house is sold with sitting tenants to a new landlord and the old landlord was not in residence, so the sitting tenants have security of tenure, the new landlord can give notice to the tenants that he intends to become a resident landlord in the house which he has purchased within six months, whereupon the tenants lose their security of tenure. That is one of the main thrusts of the amendment.

Will the Minister confirm or deny that? If that is true, a strange position will be created. If a landlord who is not resident sells a house with sitting tenants and the new owner can get vacant possession, how is the property valued? Is it being sold with vacant possession, half vacant possession or sitting tenants? It will certainly make life difficult in terms of property prices and sales, and the security of tenure enjoyed by those who live in accommodation where there is no resident landlord.

5.15 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I wish to make a short confession similar to that of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), but in relation to my notes on the amendments. The first one said, "technical" and the second, "probably technical". By the third one I could not work out whether it was technical, probably technical or neither.

I heard what the Minister said, but he will accept that this is the sort of amendment which, if we have not understood it or its implications clearly before we hear his contribution, although we can understand the words, we do not necessarily understand the consequences. Would it be possible as a matter of practice, specifically in a Bill such as this to which there are many Government amendments and new clauses at this stage, to have the courtesy of notes on Government changes in the usual way, certainly for those who served on the Committee?

Many individual constituency cases were raised in Committee which the Minister undertook to consider and do something about. Some came from his side and others from the Opposition. With a clear head and a slightly better opportunity to consider them, we may improve the Bill further. I do not pretend to know the answer, but I should be grateful for that opportunity if it is possible.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and I shall endeavour to ask my officials to produce a commentary on the Government amendments which I hope to put before the House at the earliest opportunity and which I hope will be helpful. I well understand his anxiety, because many of these issues are complex.

I assure the House that many of these amendments seek to meet the points on which commitments were made. The hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) suffered from a different problem in Committee. It was not that I made commitments to him which I subsequently broke, but I refused to make any commitments to him except on one occasion at the end, when I made a concession which surprised him. Normally he was given the thin edge of the wedge.

Mr. McCartney: On one occasion, when the Minister was not present to look after the Under-Secretary of State, she slipped up and gave me a further concession which I shall speak to on clause 14.

Mr. Waldegrave: I do not want to disappoint the hon. Gentleman but I must point out that my hon. Friend is in Finland—[Interruption.]—which precludes any such repeat. She will doubtless return recreated by a better acquaintance than many of us with Finnish opera and other cultural events.

These intricate amendments are aimed at a problem which has been brought to our attention over many years in a lengthy correspondence with a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), Mr. Bednar, and we are taking the opportunity to meet that small point.

No one who has an assured tenancy will lose it as a result of these amendments. It is about circumstances in which the residence qualification is met by the resident being the beneficiary of a trust—that can be met under the present law—and in which, if the beneficiary dies, it may take some time before another beneficiary can move into the same position. That is covered by the legislation. It would be wrong if he suddenly lost the resident qualification. That would be a radical change in the present law.

[Mr. Waldegrave]

So it is a tidying up amendment. I apologise for its intricacy. I had to read it at least as many times as the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) before I could understand it. But I assure him that it does not have the implications that he feared.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 11, in page 77, line 26, leave out 'the condition in paragraph 10(1)(c) again applies'
and insert
'that interest becomes again vested in such an individual as is mentioned in paragraph 10(1)(c) or the condition in that paragraph becomes deemed to be fulfilled by virtue of paragraph 19(1) or paragraph 20 below.'

No. 12, in page 78, line 8, at end insert—

'(2) If a period during which the condition in paragraph 10(1)(c) is deemed to be fulfilled by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above comes to an end on the death of a person who was in occupation of a dwelling-house as mentioned in paragraph (b) of that sub-paragraph, then, in determining whether that condition is at any time thereafter fulfilled, there shall be disregarded any period—

(a) which begins on the date of the death;

(b) during which the interest of the landlord remains vested as mentioned in sub-paragraph (1)(a) above; and

(c) which ends at the expiry of the period of two years beginning on the date of the death or on any earlier date on which the condition in paragraph 10(1)(c) becomes again deemed to be fulfilled by virtue of sub-paragraph (1) above.'.

No. 13, in page 78, line 16, after '18', insert 'or paragraph 19(2)'.

Clause 6

FIXING OF TERMS OF STATUTORY PERIODIC TENANCY

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 72, in page 5, line 12, after 'landlord", insert 'or the tenant'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 73.

Mr. Waldegrave: Clause 6, as hon. Members know, provides that, where a statutory periodic tenancy arises at the end of a contractual fixed-term tenancy, either the landlord or the tenant may, within 12 months, serve a notice on the other proposing a variation in the terms of the tenancy. The party on whom notice is served may, if he wishes, refer the notice to the rent assessment committee to consider whether the proposed variation is reasonable.

These amendments introduce two small but useful changes to the procedure, which I hope will be welcomed. As drafted, the Bill provides that in serving a notice of variation of terms the landlord may propose an adjustment in the rent to take account of the variation. It seems to us, on reflection, that it should be equally open to the tenant to propose an adjustment of rent in this way, and amendment No. 72 provides the tenant with just such a facility.

Amendment No. 73 extends from one month to three months the period allowed for the party on whom the notice is served under clause 6 to refer that notice to the rent assessment committee. Here we are moving exactly to meet an undertaking given in Committee. I am glad to see the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) nodding on that point. I hope, therefore, that that will be welcomed.

Since this is the first occasion I have had to refer to the hon. Member for Hammersmith, I will depart from the normal rancour and asperity of party politics to offer him the congratulations of the House on the birth of his son, who is called Benjamin I believe, which is a name with very good Tory credentials.

Mr. Allan Roberts: We welcome the concession that the tenant can ask for the rent to be reassessed. Can we have an assurance that if the tenant initiates the reassessment the rent will not be put up?

Mr. Waldegrave: The procedure is symmetrical now and the rent assessment committee can make its own judgment either way. It is the same the other way round —if the landlord puts it in the rent may go down.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 73, in page 5, line 16, leave out 'one month' and insert 'three months'.

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 5, line 18, after 'may', insert
'by an application in the prescribed form'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we shall take the following: Government amendment No. 67.

Amendment No. 228, in clause 12, page 9, line 39, at end insert—

'(3A) A notice served under subsection (2) of this section shall—

(a) be in a form prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament:

(b) contain a statement, in characters not less conspicuous than those used in any other part of the notice,

(i) that the tenant, if he does not agree to the increase, may refer the notice to a rent assessment committee, within one month of service of the notice:

(ii) that the tenant is entitled to refer the notice to a rent assessment committee to fix a market rent;

Government amendments Nos. 15 and 26.

Mr. Grist: So far as the Government amendments are concerned, a number of points were raised by hon. Members in Committee about the provisions in the Bill which involve the service of notice. In the light of the comments made, we undertook to have a further general look at these provisions. One result of so doing has been to identify the need for three further forms to be prescribed by the Secretary of State. Amendments Nos. 14, 15 and 67 make the necessary provision for this. They relate to an application to the rent assessment committee under clauses 6 or 12 and to the notice of proceedings for possession under clause 8.

I trust that hon. Members will welcome these new provisions as introducing greater clarity and certainty into the procedures concerned.

Amendment No. 26 is purely a matter of drafting. It removes an unnecessary definition in respect of the shorthold notice served under clause 18(1).

Opposition amendment No. 228 reopens an issue which we discussed at some length in Committee—whether it is sensible for a statute to specify the detailed points to be included in a notice which the Secretary of State is empowered to prescribe. Our firm view is that such a course is not sensible.

We entirely agree that it is desirable for the prescribed notice to contain essential information on the tenant's statutory rights. We shall be giving very careful consideration to what information should be provided. It may well include at least some of the points referred to in this amendment, but we do not want to prejudge the whole issue by spelling out the details in the legislation itself. That would constitute a wholly inflexible and unwieldy approach and would not, in our view, be of any service to tenants.

The Government accept the need for the principal notices under the Bill to be in a prescribed form; indeed, our own amendments extend this requirement to three further provisions. We accept, too, the need for notices to provide essential guidance for the tenant. But we resist very strongly the argument that the details of such guidance should be laid down in statute. I therefore hope that the Opposition will not press their amendment.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Clause 12, which the Government are amending and the Opposition are attempting to amend, implements the high-rent policies behind the Government's legislation. It is the clause that spells out the mechanism by which the Government are to allow landlords to change rents from fair rents to market rents. It is therefore a significant clause. It matters to all tenants of private landlords throughout the country who will receive notices that their rents are being increased, sometimes by massive amounts, to market rents. It will affect the level of rents in relation to council housing and especially those houses that are handed over to the private sector or to bodies other than local authorities. And it will have an influence on the level of rents and how that is dealt with in relation to housing associations.

So it is a very important clause and the Government amendments, while welcome, go nowhere near far enough. They do not meet the requirements that the Opposition spelled out in Committee. The Minister is correct in saying that we debated them in Committee. We debated amendment No. 192 at the ninth sitting, on Thursday 21 January—columns 361-71—and we had some assurances then from the Under-Secretary—whom I wish well in Finland, which is, as I said from a sedentary position, obviously the western equivalent of Siberia for the period of the Report stage and Third Reading of the Housing Bill.

We were given some undertakings in Committee along the lines that the Minister has just repeated, except that there was some implication in what was said then that the changes would be even more significant on Report than those we have before us in the form of the Government amendments. The Under-Secretary said that she agreed that "the notice should give the tenant some information about his statutory rights."

Very little is given in the way that the Government have tabled their amendments. She also said:

"The key piece of information that we would want to include in the prescribed form of notice is that the tenant, if he does not agree to the increase, may refer the notice to a rent assessment committee, and that he has a fixed period within which to do so."

That essential point does not appear in the amendment. We shall want to think further about what else should go into the notice, but we should certainly not want our hands to be tied by the shopping list set out in the amendment.

The Under-Secretary went on to say:

"I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be withdrawn in the light of my assurance that the notice needs to give the tenant some basic information."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 21 January 1988; c. 366.]

On the basis of that and other assurances given by the Minister in Committee, the Opposition withdrew the amendment. But we should not have withdrawn it; we should have pressed it to a vote, because the Government have not come forward with the results of the assurances that they gave us in Committee. So we want to press amendment 228; we want to keep it before the House and not withdraw it. It would give the tenants the rights and the knowledge that they need. We are talking about the notices that will go out to increase rents massively and change fair rents into market rents.

First, the tenant, if he does not agree to the increase, should be able to refer the notice to a rent assessment committee within one month of service of the notice. Secondly, the tenant is entitled to refer the notice to a rent assessment committee to fix the market rent, rather than its just being fixed on the basis of what the landlord or the Secretary of State for the Environment thinks the market rent should be—and I am sure that his idea of the market rent would be higher than anybody else's. Thirdly, the tenant's security of tenure under this Act should not be affected by his referring the notice to a rent assessment committee.

It is the shorthold assured tenancy that is difficult, because, if a tenant starts to be awkward and refers things to a rent assessment committee, when the shorthold period of six months is up the landlord can throw him out anyway and get someone who is not as awkward and does not take these issues to a rent assessment committee. However, that is another issue in relation to our opposition to the concept of shorthold tenancies.

We believe also that the tenant should be entitled to agree with the landlord a variation different from that proposed in the notice or to agree that the rent should not be varied. The Government claim to be in favour of agreements and negotiations between the two parties in terms of property, without any Government impositions; that is their justification for the whole concept of shorthold tenancies. The Government claim also that tenants and landlords are equal partners, but they know full well that that is not the case. The tenant often has to accept, as a supplicant, the landlord's offer because if he does not do so he will be made homeless.

5.30 pm

We believe also that no further notice should be served under subsection (2) in respect of the tenancy until after the first anniversary of the original notice's date of service. In other words, there should be at least one year's breathing space before the landlord may initiate proceedings to push up his rents even higher. Such is not unreasonable or bureaucratic, and it should be written into the legislation. We cannot just accept Ministers' bland assurances that at some future time a code might be produced which will incorporate such safeguards but that they need not be in the Bill. When the courts interpret any legislation, it is only what is in the Act that matters. Codes of conduct and notes of guidance are not legally binding and are not necessarily enforceable in law. Ministers' assurances cannot be quoted in courts of law in order to justify a tenant's action or an attack on those of the landlord. Therefore, we ask the Government to accept amendment No. 228; if not, the Opposition will not withdraw it.

Mr. Simon Hughes: My name is also appended to this amendment, and I remember well the debate in Committee. I take a slightly different position from that of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), because I do not necessarily argue that such provisions should be included in the substantive Act. However, I seek from the Minister assurances additional to those which he has already given.

The House has been reminded that we pressed in Committee that certain matters should be made explicit when the notice is served. The Minister's assurances, coupled with those given by his hon. Friend in Committee, do not go far enough. Nobody should underestimate the potential effect of this clause on private sector tenants, who will be taken out of rent control and into a free market system. The reality of that could be substantial rent increases.

We ask that when tenants are informed of potentially enormous rent increases the document giving that information should state in bold lettering—and, as is said in the amendment, the wording of which comes from other Acts, that the tenant may refer the matter to the rent assessment committee and state the time in which he is allowed to do that. It should state also that the rent assessment committee has power to fix a market rent. That may still not provide any great security, but at least the rent may be reduced from being extortionate to one that is truly a market rent. It should be made clear also that if, a tenant goes to the rent assessment committee, that will not affect his security. Many tenants are terrified that if they go to what they think of as a court, that they will lose everything; that is a common fear of tenants. The notice should make plain that the tenant is free to negotiate with his landlord, and that no further notice or regular demand can be served until after the first anniversary of the earlier notice.

"in characters not less conspicuous than those used in any other part of the notice"—

I am sure that the Minister accepts that those are perfectly proper concerns. It is vital that a notice which may be put through the letterbox of a multi-occupancy property, and which might be received by people who do not have English as their first language, should be clear as to its implications and about the opportunities which exist for the tenant thereafter. I ask the Minister to assure the House that, whatever may be the final form of the notice, it will include the information which the amendment suggests. It is one of the most important documents that tenants in the private sector will receive. That information needs to be presented clearly and boldly, leaving no room for uncertainty. The House must be given such an assurance, if it is to be satisfied.

Mr. McCartney: As the person who moved the original amendment in Committee, and as it forms 50 per cent. of the concessions I have achieved during the three months of debating the Bill, I am bitterly disappointed that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment is not in her place. I prepared for today's debate a savage indictment of her failure to make adequate proposals confirming her clear and unequivocal promise, given on the morning of the debate in Committee. However, I am relieved that the Under-Secretary is holidaying in Finland rather than in Iceland. Had she chosen Iceland, I would have waited for the Government to introduce proposals for low-cost housing in the United Kingdom, including igloos. Some people, because of cuts in capital allocations, are suffering from heating conditions such as those which exist in igloos; one might then ask the Government to provide resources for heating assessments.

The Minister will understand that, in directing my fire at his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, I am directing it at him also. In Committee, we sought with our amendment to assist the Government, as we did during the whole 180 hours of debate. On every occasion, I and my hon. Friends attempted to improve the Bill, despite our fundamental opposition to the Government's proposals. We tried in practical ways to assist the people who will have to live with the consequences of the Bill. We attempted to improve the Bill in the best ways we could, in terms of clearly setting out the rights of the individual to assessment and advice, be it from housing organisations —and I shall not name those in Leicester in case I fail to mention anyone—law centres and so on.

It is essential that the Government respond more adequately to amendment No. 228, which is coupled with Government amendment No. 14. It is important to consider rent arrears that will result from the changes made in housing benefit, and the effect that will have on schedule 2 to the Bill. One must consider also the implications for security of tenure and the draconian effect of the introduction of market rents on the budgets of low-income families, as well as the role of the rent assessment committee and its direct influence on rents and related matters. It is important that tenants' rights should be clearly set out in statute and that their security of tenure in rented accommodation should also be safeguarded.

In Committee, I quoted a promise given to my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley). The Under-Secretary stated:

"the question of information is being considered. I see no reason why that should not be done as it would be helpful to both landlord and tenant."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 12 January 1988; c. 50]

Subsequently, my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) was, as he so eloquently highlighted earlier, given assurances that on Report the Government would bring forward specific improved arrangements that would be satisfactory to the Opposition.

The Minister's latest assurances are inadequate because they do not answer the grievances expressed by myself and by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). At one point, even the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) commented about his feeling of uncertainty about the way in which the Bill was drafted. I hope that the Minister will not proceed as he has done earlier but will give an assurance that he will consider seriously what has been said.

In Committee the Under-Secretary played a game called "Give us a clue". Each time she got up to utter soothing words she gave us another clue. We wanted to know what the Government's concessions meant, what precisely they would put in the notice and what they intended to do to alleviate the worries expressed by us and by the housing associations and organisations involved with tenants in the private sector. We waited from March until now and the Government have offered us nothing, not a single dot or comma in answer to the points raised in Committee.

The Minister has taken the place of the Under-Secretary. He has indicated that it is not normal practice to set out in detail the information we require and that the Secretary of State does not seek such powers in legislation. That is rich coming from a Government who, every time they introduce legislation, give draconian powers to the Secretary of State to cover almost any circumstances they can think of. The wording is so loose that on many occasions the Secretary of State's powers cover circumstances which were not thought of when the legislation was drafted.

We are not in that ball game on housing. There are clear precedents in legislation for the Government to set out in detail the rights of tenants. For example, section 83 of the Housing Act 1985 sets out tenants' rights in detail in the notice seeking possession. In sections 51 and 52 of the Rent Act 1977 the arrangements for security of tenure and rent levels are set out specifically. Therefore, our proposals in Committee and again today are in line with current Government thinking.

The Minister knows that one thing I could not be accused of is naivety. If I could be accused of anything, perhaps it would be of reading too much into what the Minister and the Under-Secretary said in Committee. I might be accused of being moderate and of putting aside some of my opposition to what was said by the Government in the hope that they would come forward with genuine proposals.

Are not the Government operating double standards? The Minister is not prepared to insert a simple provision which would make clear the rights of private tenants, yet during the eight years that the Government have been in power they have dealt specifically with every aspect of tenants' rights under local authorities. They have been prepared to detail the rights and obligations of tenants in local authority housing. As a member of a local authority involved with housing I have no objection to that, but I object to double standards. A local authority tenant has protection and rights; the tenant in the private sector has few rights and under this legislation he will have fewer still. My hon. Friends and I are not prepared to accept those nauseating double standards.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle said, in Committee I set out in detail the principles behind our amendment. The debate is recorded in columns 361-371 of the Official Report of the Committee's proceedings on 21 January. Because my hon. Friends wish to speak in this debate, I shall not repeat those arguments. My hon. Friend the Member for Bootle has put forward many of them today. Therefore, I simply point out to the Minister that it is essential that tenants' rights are protected. There is no point in the Minister making a spurious argument about supporting tenants' rights if the tenant cannot exercise those rights because they are not set out in statute and there is no detail about how he can seek advice.

5.45 pm

The Minister conceded in Committee that we are not dealing in the market place with bodies of equal opportunity. The landlord has significantly greater power to determine the level of rent and the condition of the property. The tenants' negotiating strength is non-existent. The Minister conceded that fact in Committee, and he and the Under-Secretary indicated on numerous occasions that they would produce practical proposals to take account of what I and my hon. Friends had said.

When I moved the amendment in Committee I said:

"The amendment is practical and does not undermine the fundamental thrust of the Government in relation to the Bill but puts a little meat on the bones of the statement made by the Under-Secretary of State on 12 January. I hope that the Minister will respond positively and either accept the amendment or give an assurance that she will come forward with proposals at a later date. Anything other than that would be a negation of the promise that she gave in the debate, and would undermine our understanding of the promise given to the Committee by the Minister for Housing and Planning that he would consider amendments that were practical and which assisted the passage of the Bill, assisted tenants and their rights and resulted in good relations between tenants and landlords."

We cannot get any more sympathetic, moderate or practical phraseology. The Minister has had from 21 January until now to make good the promises of the Under-Secretary of State. She promised:

"The key piece of information that we should want to include in the prescribed form of notice is that the tenant, if he does not agree to the increase, may refer the notice to a rent assessment committee, and that he has a fixed period within which to do so. That essential point does not appear in the amendment. We shall want to think further about what else should go into the notice".

Later she said in a poignant whisper:

"I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be withdrawn in the light of my assurance that the notice needs to give the tenant some basic information."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 21 January 1988; c. 365-66.]

I accepted in faith what the Minister said and, despite the concern of some of my hon. Friends, I dutifully withdrew the amendment. I have to ask the Minister again not to give me empty promises, as the Under-Secretary did in Committee, but to come to the Dispatch Box and produce the goods for once in his life. The Under-Secretary could not do so. The Secretary of State is not here. The Minister has an opportunity to speak his own mind for once. So often we have seen the young leviathan harpooned behind the Speaker's Chair. For three months the Under-Secretary gave promise after promise. Then, almost at the end of the Committee, the Secretary of State put his little head round the door and a look was enough. The leviathan was harpooned.

I ask the Minister to go back to the Dispatch Box and give a firm commitment. Without a commitment, the reality in the market place will be that tenants' rights and their ability to challenge ruthless landlords will be eroded. The Minister's soothing words will be of no use to many of my constituents, some of whom I mentioned in Committee. I referred to genuine cases of hardship. They will be affected by landlords who are ruthless in the extreme. Landlords will pressure tenants and affect rent levels, conditions and other matters that we are trying to improve and get out of the public and private housing sectors. Unless the Minister gives a commitment, his words will be no more than empty promises, and hundreds of thousands of private sector tenants will surely face not only the effects of increasing rents but the real possibility of harassment and losing their right to continued occupation of their properties. We shall not countenance that. We shall press the matter if the Minister does not come up with some proposals.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Perhaps the lesson for my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) is that he should not be so moderate. Perhaps he should not listen to and take promises from Tory Ministers. That is particularly so, as he indicated, because there seems to be a running battle between the Secretary of State and the Minister. The press would have us believe that the Minister is the moderate in this game, but he recognises the potential for Rachmanites and so on. Whenever he wants to put forward some basic protection for private sector tenants, the Secretary of State makes it perfectly clear that that is out of the question. My hon. Friend was absolutely right. With this legislation, in which, in effect, protection and security for private sector tenants is being thrown overboard, it is perfectly right and proper that we should do our utmost in Committee and on Report, as we are not doing, to try to provide some basic protection and security, especially when landlords propose increases.

It is perfectly clear that, in most cases, the proposed increases will be quite substantial. To a large extent, the whole Bill is based on the fact that rents should be market rents. As I said on Second Reading, in certain parts of the country—certainly in greater London—many market rents will be higher than mortgage repayments, except that the people concerned will not be able to claim tax relief on their rent payments. We know also that the responsibility of rent officers will be to see to it that, in many cases, housing benefit will not apply to the rents that are demanded by private landlords.

If there were an adequate supply of accommodation, our fears would be less justified, but we all know that demand is far greater than supply. If a private tenant is asked for a rent increase under clause 12, it is perfectly understandable that that tenant and his family will be absolutely terrified about what will happen unless he pays that rent increase.

We are suggesting that there should be certain basic protections, that the notice should be quite clearly set out, and that a tenant's security of tenure will not be affected by referring the notice to a rent assessment committee. Surely there is nothing wrong with such safeguards. Surely they do not undermine the purpose of the Bill. The Under-Secretary gave my hon. Friend a promise; it is quite clear that no such promise will be implemented. To a large extent, it is a test not for the Secretary of State but for the Minister. The Minister has done his utmost to get maximum publicity. He has said that there will be adequate safeguards against harassment and Rachmanites, and that all kinds of things will be done so that tenants will be able to claim compensation in court and so on.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): They would be able to apply for compensation only after they had been thrown out of their properties.

Mr. Winnick: As my hon. Friend says, if they are thrown out, they will not get back into their accommodation.

Of course, Mr. Ingham and co. have done their utmost to get the most favourable publicity this week for the Minister's various statements. What we have said is not rhetoric, statements or publicity handouts by information Ministers; it is what will be done to try to protect the tenants. What will we do to ensure that tenants and their families receive at least some basic protection against eviction and finding themselves homeless? One of the tests of the sincerity of the Minister's publicly declared wish that tenants should not be subject to harassment is whether the Government are willing to accept amendment No. 228.

Mr. Grist: I do not know whether Opposition Members are sirens of beguilement or alarm. Unfortunately, they serve to raise alarm among current tenants who will not be affected by the changes. Therefore, Opposition Members sow despondency where it should not be sown. They beguiled by telling me—I was not on the Committee, although I have read the Committee debates—that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary gave promises that were not met in the Government amendments. What was promised then has been met by the Government this evening.

We are following the precedent of the Rent Act 1977. Again, prescription has been made by the Secretary of State—for instance, in orders and notices such as this—in considerable length and detail, which I shall read if hon. Members wish, but which is not included in the Act itself. We are discussing whether prescription should be on the face of the Bill. We believe that we should follow the precedent of the Rent Act and that we should take great care about what goes into the legislation. I assure Opposition Members that much of the information in amendment No. 228 will be included in the prescribed form under clause 12, but we do not want to put it in a form that may not be suitable later.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): On innumerable occasions in Committee we asked about rent and whether the Minister would be prepared to assure us that a rent increase for people on housing benefit will be matched by a housing benefit increase. Will he assure Opposition Members and those who are interested in the fact that their rent may go up that such increases will be met by housing benefit? It seems to some of us that the reduction in housing benefit will mean that market rent levels will not be met by housing benefit.

Mr. Grist: Assurances have been given over and over again, but I do not see how they arise from this group of amendments.

Mr. Simon Hughes: As the Minister will have heard earlier, I accept the point about the matter going into regulations. Perhaps it is the lawyer in me that is more used to dealing with such matters, but I still do not quite understand why the Minister cannot explicitly say that what is in the amendment will be in the regulations. There is nothing unreasonable in that request. It is quite reasonable to ask for an assurance that the request in this amendment will be accepted for inclusion in the document and in the notice. I should be grateful if the Minister would say what, if anything, he finds difficult. If there is nothing difficult, surely the Government should now be in a position to say that they accept it, and their position would be much better.

Mr. Grist: That seems rather otiose. The situation has worked perfectly well with the Rent Acts. I should have thought that that would have given the assurance that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members are seeking.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 7

ORDERS FOR POSSESSION

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 282, in page 6, line 27, leave out '1' and insert '10A'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider the following: Government amendments Nos. 282, 286, 288.

Amendment No. 225, in schedule 2, page 80, line 37, at end insert—

'Ground 10A

Suitable alternative accommodation acceptable to the tenant is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order for possession takes effect.'.

Government amendments Nos. 290, 291, 284 and 285.

Mr. Grist: A good deal of concern was expressed in Committee about the fact that ground 1 of schedule 2 gives a landlord a mandatory right to possession of a dwelling on an assured tenancy where he makes suitable alternative accommodation available. We undertook to consider making that ground discretionary and the amendment achieves that.

Under section 98 of the Rent Act 1977 the court will be able to consider whether it is reasonable to grant possession taking full account of the tenant's circumstances. Opposition amendment No. 225 provides a slightly different version of the discretionary ground under which the alternative accommodation must be acceptable to the tenant. That will not do because if the tenant is prepared to accept the accommodation, the landlord would not have gone to court in the first place.

Mr. Soley: In Committee, the Minister assured my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that if we withdrew our amendment he would be prepared to consider amending the ground so as to require the court to consider whether it was reasonable to grant possession under the Rent Act 1977. The Minister went on to say that that was the major change.

Amendment No. 225 places the ground in a discretionary category and includes a repeat of amendment No. 34 moved in Committee which sought to make alternative accommodation acceptable to the tenant. We are concerned about acceptability to the tenant. I know that in Committee the Minister accepted that the discretion should lie with the court. However, we believe that there are real problems about defining what is suitable for a tenant.

We explained in Committee that a person might be told that he is being offered alternative accommodation without a garden which may be the same or even better internally when compared to the previous accommodation. Who is to decide whether the alternative accommodation is suitable? If the tenant claims that it is not suitable, presumably he can appeal to the court. However, we are still worried that a situation might arise, especially with regard to the elderly who may have an attachment to a house, flat, garden or an area in which they may have lived for many years, in which people will not consider alternative accommodation to be suitable.

I want the Minister to address problems that may arise in that context. The elderly may be presented with an option which even the landlord and even the court in certain circumstances feel is appropriate but which the elderly tenant may, often for psychological reasons—an attachment to a particular flat, grounds, garden or area —consider unacceptable. We have been troubled by that matter of judgment, especially with regard to the elderly.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I welcome the concession from a mandatory to a discretionary ground because we argued for that in Committee. However, I am somewhat sceptical about this. I understand the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). The insertion of the words "acceptable to the tenant" in practice might mean that a property would never be offered as an alternative. A tenant would always be able to say that it was not acceptable for some reason or another. It is better, with one caveat that I will describe in a moment, to allow the matter to be adjudicated by the court.

My caveat arises from my experience of these cases. Quite understandably, because judges are not especially keen to spend their days on site considering bathroom sizes, the court suffers from the disadvantage that we discussed in Committee of not being specially charged with housing matters. We discussed in Committee how soon the review and establishment of housing courts would happen. One of the failures of the court system, which need not be a failure inherent in a system that adjudicates on these matters, is that there should be a system which allows proper and slightly fuller evidence to be given in written form about the nature of the accommodation needed and that offered.

I do not support amendment No. 225 and I accept the reasonable concession that has been made. I hope that my concern will be heard on the Government Front Bench and in other Government Departments that are reviewing the matter, so that when the courts and/or their successors—tribunals or housing courts—have to adjudicate what is acceptable or suitable they can do so in a much more rounded way than at present. The courts make the decisions, but they are often made in a remote way.

There is a danger that sometimes what a court says is suitable is not suitable in practice. For example, a family in my constituency consists of a widowed mother and a mentally handicapped adult son. The mentally handicapped adult son is enormously hyperactive. He bounces around the house. He jumps around bumping into things and pulls doors off their hinges. He is very strong. They are suitably housed in terms of accommodation because they have enough bedrooms, a kitchen and a living room. However, we have been trying to get the family moved to more suitable accommodation for two or three years because they need outdoor space so that the adult son can have freedom to let off his energy without vandalising the home. That outdoor space must be enclosed so that the community and neighbourhood are not embarrassed.

A strict definition of suitable accommodation may not produce such an alternative because strictly two bedrooms are sufficient. There should be a discretion for the court to consider the definition of suitable accommodation. The court should be given a slightly wider brief in future and consider itself to have a slightly wider roving task to come to fair decisions in all cases and not push tenants out to what may not be a suitable alternative home.

Mr. Grist: I imagine that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) will welcome the terms of the Lord Chancellor's review which would go some way towards meeting the hon. Gentleman's demands, and we are considering that review at the moment.

We have already met the difficulty raised by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). The court will judge what is suitable for the tenant. It must be left to the court to decide. It is almost impossible to make a prescription and if we try to do that we shall find that ill justice will be done to many people, and a court would be prevented from righting such injustices in the future.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 75, in page 6, line 30, leave out 'which is for the time being'
and insert
'to take effect at a time when it is'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 283, in page 6, line 32, leave out 'Ground 9 or Ground 10' and insert 'or Ground 9'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider the following: amendment No. 326, in schedule 2, page 80, leave out lines 28 to 35.

Government amendment No. 287.

Amendment No. 226, in page 80, line 30, leave out 'some rent lawfully due from the tenant is more than three months in arrears',
and insert
'at least three months rent lawfully due from the tenant is in arrears.'.

No. 237, in page 80, line 32, leave out lines 32 to 35.

No. 238, in page 80, line 37, at end insert—

'Ground 10A

Whether or not any rent is in arrears on the date on which proceedings for possession are begun, the tenant has persistently delayed paying rent which has become lawfully due.'.

Government amendment No. 289.

Amendment No. 327, in page 81, line 30, at end insert—

'Ground 17

Both at the date of the service of the notice under section 8 of this Act relating to the proceedings for possession and at the date of the hearing, some rent lawfully due from the tenant is more than three months in arrears.

Whether or not any rent is in arrears on the date on which proceedings for possession are begun, the tenant has persistently delayed paying rent which has become lawfully due.'

Mr. Waldegrave: This group of amendments honours important undertakings that we gave in Committee and I hope that Opposition Members will welcome them. Hon. Members will recall that we agreed to look again at the persistent arrears ground because it was argued in Committee that persistent arrears were sometimes the fault of delays in the housing benefit payments system. We listened to the arguments and were convinced by them, because such arrears would be outside the control of the tenant.

We have therefore decided that the ground should be made discretionary and several Oppposition Members and one or two of my hon. Friends argued for that. The amendment will enable the court to consider whether persistent delays are under the tenant's control.

We also agreed to have another look at ground 10 because the drafting was ambiguous. The more we looked at it, the more we saw that it could be read either way. The amendment makes it quite clear; we have spelt it out so that there can be no doubt. For this ground to apply, the tenant must be owing at least three months' rent at the date of the court hearing. If the tenant pays off any of the arrears before the hearing, the ground will not apply, and if it was the result of a housing benefit computer failure it would be open to the local authority to make a single, one-off payment into the court to bring the arrears back under three months.

I hope that the amendments will be welcomed by the Oppositon and alliance parties. They are intended to deal with the cogent arguments that were put forward in Committee.

Mr. Soley: I am grateful to the Minister for making those concessions. I thank him for his earlier comment, but I assure him that there are other derivatives of "Ben" besides "Benjamin". One of them is "Bennett". A second one is "Tam", which has a certain Scottish and Labour ring about it.

On amendments Nos. 237 and 238, am I right in thinking that the Minister is not happy about making the provision discretionary under ground 11? It was made discretionary in the Scottish Bill. I am not clear whether the Minister said that it will now be discretionary or mandatory. I welcome the other concessions that the Minister has made.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I, too, welcome the concessions. There was a substantial debate about the matter in Committee. I wish, however, to press the Minister on my amendments Nos. 326 and 327 that argue for discretion in relation to outstanding arrears of up to three months. The Minister said that if it was a housing benefit delay, it would be open to a local authority to make a single payment so that the total outstanding arrears would fall below three months.

A frequent problem is that people think that their rent is being paid when it is not being paid. That problem often arises at the beginning of a new financial year when the amount of rent is varied or when the amount of DHSS help is varied. It also arises when people think that other odds and ends are included in the rent. They think that the DHSS pays for everything, but central heating is not paid for by the Department. Tenants are unaware of that liability, and they have to settle the account. There may be entirely unpredictable and unforeseeable occasions when somebody finds himself three months in arrear. It may amount to £1 a week, the central heating part of the rent, or it may be that part of the rent that is not met by housing benefit and Government support. According to the Bill, the tenancy of such a person could be terminated.

The Minister has thought about it and the officials have done their work. The rest of the concessions are entirely acceptable, but in equity, and to ensure that the courts temper justice with mercy when somebody ought not to have a mandatory possession order made against him, that problem ought to be looked at again.

I do not expect the Minister to say immediately that he will meet that request. It will need to be considered, but I ask him to look at it. There is sufficient evidence to justify that request.

Mr. Waldegrave: I confirm to the hon. Members for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that we have not changed our mind. Three months' arrears remains a mandatory ground in the Bill.

We have to remember the other side of the coin. If a landlord has lost a large amount of money because of a bureaucratic foul-up, it is open to the tenant to go to one or other of those bits of bureaucracy and say, "My case is coming up in court. I shall automatically lose my tenancy if you do not deal with the matter." All that the bureaucracy has to do is to make one payment to bring the arrears down under three months.

I do not intend to make any further concessions. We would then go too far the other way. We have to remember that small landlords can be in extreme difficulties because somebody is avoiding paying his rent. We think that we have now got it about right.

Ms. Primarolo: The Minister referred to bureaucratic bungles—to a fault by the DHSS or the local authority, or to failure to pay maintenance leading to an accumulation of arrears. Why are tenants being used as a battering ram against errors that they have not made? Even if the landlord has a genuine case, it is not right for him to use the tenant as a battering ram. We are seeking to protect tenants' rights. They should not be used as pawns when the Government seek to protect the interests of landlords, courts, local authorities or the Department of Health and Social Security. The Minister ought to think again and accept our amendments.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are trying to establish a reasonable balance. The hon. Lady is quite right when she says that we should not use tenants as a battering ram against bureaucratic failure, but the landlord should not have to pay because one part of the bureaucracy or another has failed to provide the money that it owes. It does not have to sort itself out properly. It simply has to make one payment to bring the arrears back under three months and then sort itself out. The DHSS or the housing benefit office must accept its liability and make one payment to bring the arrears back under three months. The tenancy is then safe.

Mr. Soley: The arrears provision was made discretionary in the Scottish Bill by means of ground 11. They got round the problem in that way. Why was it appropriate to make it discretionary in the Scottish Bill if it is not appropriate to make it discretionary in the Bill for England and Wales? If the argument were so forceful as to make the provision discretionary in the Scottish Bill, why are England and Wales so different? Why not meet the problem that is worrying the Minister and, quite rightly, is worrying my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) by dealing with it, if necessary, through the courts on a discretionary basis, should there be a dispute?

Mr. Waldegrave: There are a number of respects in which the housing legislation for Scotland differs from that for England and Wales. We have come to the conclusion that the concessions that we have made, plus the method that is open to the housing benefit office, if that should be necessary—although it very seldom is—achieves a reasonable balance between the tenant and the landlord. There are a number of respects in which Scottish law shows that the boot is on the other foot. We do not always follow Scottish legislation.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 2

Grounds for Possession of Dwelling-houses let on Assured Tenancies

Amendments made: No. 286 in page 78, leave out lines 32 to 34.

No. 16, in page 79, line 18, leave out

'assured tenancy is for a term certain'

and insert

'tenancy is a fixed term tenancy for a term'.

No. 17, in page 79, line 26, leave out

'assured tenancy is for a term certain'

and insert

'tenancy is a fixed term tenancy for a term'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 293, in page 79, line 43, after 'possession', insert

'or, if that landlord is a registered housing association or charitable housing trust, a superior landlord'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Government amendment No. 294.

Amendment No. 219, in page 80, line 15, at end insert:

'(e)suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order for possession takes effect.'.

Amendment No. 220, in page 81, line 33, after 'Ground 1', insert 'and Ground 7'.

Mr. Waldegrave: The amendments deal with the question of suitable alternative accommodation. Opposition Members wanted us to make it a condition of the redevelopment ground for possession that there should be suitable alternative accommodation available for any displaced tenant. We thought that that was too restrictive. We do not want the ground to be so circumscribed that it is useless. Moreover, there is already a ground for possession where suitable alternative accommodation is available. I should emphasise that this ground can be used only in respect of assured tenancies, not for Rent Act tenancies and not if the landlord has bought the property over the head of an existing tenant, and only if the landlord has made every effort to ensure that the work cannot be done without displacing the tenant. It is not a ground that can be used lightly to evict. However, it must not be so hedged with restrictions that it is unusable, as clearly there are large areas in which we want to encourage sensible development.

Amendment No. 293 meets the undertaking that I gave in Committee to examine the amendment suggested by the empty property unit. I am glad to say that we have adopted the suggestion and extended the ground to superior landlords where the immediate landlord is a registered housing association or a charitable housing trust—a matter that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) raised in Committee. I hope, as the unit believes, that the amendment will facilitate the use of short-life property, and that must be an objective for us all—in all cities and in London especially.

Amendment No. 294 redrafts the ground in certain ways. It covers joint tenants, so that it cannot be used where some of the tenants in an agreement antedated the purchase of a property by the landlord even though others came in after he acquired it. That is a useful additional protection for tenants.

The amendment also makes it clear that there may be alternative reasons why it is not possible to carry out the work without displacing the tenant. The original version set out a series of conditions, all of which had to be fulfilled before the ground could apply. This amendment makes the ground more flexible without, I believe, undermining the position of tenants in any way. I hope that the proposals will be welcomed by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey and perhaps by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire).

Mr. Battle: It strikes me as ironic that the schedule should be attached to a part of the Bill that refers to security of tenure, given that it deals with grounds for possession. Schedule 2 highlights the great trap for private tenants in the Bill. When the schedule was presented in Committee it showed a marked shift of rights from the private tenant to the landlord. Discretion was taken away from the courts and grounds for possession were made mandatory. I note that the Secretary of State is now present. We have had some welcome concessions on two or three of the earlier grounds. However, I suggest that Government amendment 293 represents a toughening of the original position. As I understand the proposal, a landlord who wants to develop a room in a house in which a tenant rents another room will have the right to claim that the builder has to walk through the tenant's room and that that gives grounds to evict the tenant. In that sense, the amendment extends and toughens ground 7 rather than conceding any of the points that we made about defending tenants' rights.

Ground 7 comes from the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. Throughout the Committee stage we argued that the schedule took away tenants' rights under the 1977 Act and marked a shift away from tenants' rights. In Committee, the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) harked back to the 1954 Act, but it is worth remembering that that Act referred to commercial tenancies. It is not common for tenants to have an understanding of complex contractual law. They do not go through the fine print of the contract with their landlord—if they get a contract, that is.

When people need a home to rent they do not enter into proper contracts with landlords as a matter of free consent. They enter into contracts in which there is inequality of power between the contracting partners—the landlord and the tenant. The purpose of amendment No. 219 is to press the case that suitable alternative accommodation should be made available to ensure that ground 7 does not become a developers' charter, enabling the landlord to winkle out the tenant and gain possession so that he can redevelop the home only to let it at a higher rent, leaving the original tenant on the street.

We had a long debate in Committee in which the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire raised the point that the whole clause hinges on the word "intention". We must ask what is the intention of the landlord. Does he have a real intention to develop or does he simply propose to obtain planning permission or the suggestion of tenders to provide the necessary evidence to obtain a court order to evict without providing safeguards for tenants?

The Minister will say that ground 7 contains safeguards to prevent a developer from acquiring the freehold over the head of sitting tenants and then using the ground to evict them. The safeguard provides that neither the landlord seeking possession nor any landlord who owned the freehold since the tenancy was granted can have bought the freehold, as opposed to acquiring it by inheritance or gift. However, those safeguards can be bypassed. If the landlord is a company, there is nothing to stop the developer buying a majority shareholding in the landlord and then using ground 7.

In parenthesis, I remind hon. Members that the business expansion scheme proposal lays the clause wide open because the business expansion scheme offers incentives of £500,000. I would add that some of our anger at the way in which the Bill has been brought before us on Report is that it reflects the fact that the Government have made up housing policy piecemeal. The business expansion scheme was presumably being prepared for the Budget in March precisely when we were discussing the clause, yet we could not discuss the impact that it would have. The Bill should have been referred back to the Committee so that we could study the impact of the business expansion scheme on ground 7, because the BES provision buys developers into the Bill at tenants' expense. If the landlord is a company, or becomes a company with a grant under the new business expansion scheme, there is nothing to stop a developer buying a majority shareholding in that company and then using ground 7. There will have been no change in the identity of the landlord—the landlord is still the company—so the safeguard will not apply.

Whether the landlord is an individual or a company, there is nothing to stop a developer entering into an agreement with him under which the developer provides finance for so-called redevelopment. The clause is wide open for exploitation under the business expansion scheme provision. How will the clause close doors to future Rachmans or to the other individuals mentioned in Committee? The answer is that it will not; it will blast them wide open.

Under the clause as drafted, the tenant may be able to avoid possession by giving up that part of the home required by the landlord to carry out the improvement and redevelopment work. But if the landlord wants to arrange for the builder to walk through his room, that does not apply. The only safeguard that can be solidly built into the clause is the provision of suitable alternative accommodation. The scope for abuse by landlords using ground 7 to gain possession to sell rather than to develop and the vulnerability of sitting tenants to developers using ground 7 to sell or redevelop makes a mockery of the White Paper, which claimed that the Bill would give increased protection to tenants. Ground 7 will undermine tenants' protection and make a mockery of that claim.

I detect that a fracture is developing at the heart of the Government's housing policy. That fracture was evident in the Bill. Sometimes we were told to pay attention to the market because the brave winds of the market were being brought in to free the housing market and provide more housing. In Committee the hon. Member for Eastbourne

(Mr. Gow) reminded us often of the works of Milton Friedman who tried to define competitive capitalism. Milton Friedman said that it operates

"provided the transaction [within the market place] is bilaterally voluntary and informed exchange can bring about co-ordination without coercion."

He put into italics the words:

"provided the transaction is bilaterally voluntary and informed".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 19 January 1988; c. 259.]

6.30 pm

Under ground 7 there is no equality. There is no bilateral, voluntary and informed contract between landlord and tenant. The power to evict is given to the landlord.

The Government's policy has been based on the philosophy of the social market. There is a fracture in the Government's policy in that the Minister has been underlining the word "social" in the phrase "social market economy". Although we have not yet seen it, he has offered us the social landlord and the social charter. I suspect that the Secretary of State has been underlining the word "market". Therefore, the Minister for Housing and Planning has been stressing the word "social" and the Secretary of State has been stressing the word "market" at the expense of the word "social". Those two things are totally incompatible and the Housing Bill is now emerging as a real hotch-potch.

If the Bill is designed to transform the private rented market, there is a responsibility to ensure that those who have to live in that transformed private rented market do not feel that they are among the most insecure in our society, barring the homeless who do not even merit a mention in the Bill. The Bill is a missed opportunity.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I will not attempt to answer some of the points made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) except to say that earlier today he and I took part in a television programme on Channel 4 on this very subject. As always happens—I am sure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that in your long and distinguished career you will have done the same—as soon as one steps out from the television studio, one kicks oneself for not having thought of the simple answer to what had appeared to be a tricky question when sitting before the camera. The hon. Member for Leeds, West said then that there was no mention of homelessness in the Bill. The House will recall that in the Employment Act 1988 there is no mention of unemployment. The purpose of employment Acts is to increase employment and the purpose of the Housing Bill is to increase the availability of housing. I am sure that when it receives Royal Assent it will do that.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's fine tuning of the definition of "suitable alternative accommodation". I am sure that that is right because I believe that it will facilitate a better and more productive use of our existing housing stock. However, in the event of a disagreement or dispute between the landlord and the tenant as to the suitability of the alternative accommodation provided by the landlord, who acts as the final arbiter? I wonder whether my hon. Friend the Minister will consider that point during this Report stage.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Amendment No. 293 is welcome. The provisions of that amendment were tabled on an all-party basis in Committee by the hon. Members for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) and myself. We are members of the management committee of the empty property unit.

Mr. McCartney: Namedropper.

Mr. Hughes: No doubt if the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) was a London Member he would be desperate to obtain a place on that management committee—[Interruption.]—and desperate to obtain accommodation.

I should like to pick up the points made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). Ground 7 is a ground for possession if there is to be a development of the building. I accept that it is limited because it does not apply to buildings acquired financially. It applies to buildings that are inherited or otherwise held. Nevertheless, it is a common occurrence that the landlord of privately owned property may wish to develop the property, demolish it, reconstruct it wholly or in part, or "carry out substantial works." The landlord may start to do that and leave the tenant with nowhere to go and no other offer of property from that landlord.

I accept that the Minister and the Secretary of State will say, quite reasonably, that the landlord may not own another property. That may be true. However, if that tenant could not have his or her interest sustained while the property was being redeveloped, probably for continued letting, would it not be right that that tenant should have access to a type of mobility exchange scheme that would require the landlord to provide suitable alternative accommodation? It may be accommodation obtained through another route and not property belonging to the landlord or property over which he has control.

There is another necessary qualification—that is, if the building was about to fall down or have a notice served on it by the local council. Clearly, one could not expect a tenant to remain in a property that was about to disappear. However, as the hon. Member for Leeds, West argued, it is unacceptable that at the whim of a landlord a tenant can be made homeless. The landlord may simply want to develop a building so as to provide more properties and generate more income and it is wrong that a tenant has no answer from the landlord or the court because the ground for possession is mandatory. The landlord can simply say, "I am sorry, but you will have to leave. We have no way of telling you where you should go and it is no longer possible for this to be your home."

It is often the case—not always—that the mandatory ground for possession of private property affects the old and the single. It is often the case that it is single pensioners or pensioner couples who, having lived for many years in a property, find themselves in such a position. Local authorities do not respond quickly and housing associations do not have anything available quickly. They are not willing to move until the person is actually homeless or very nearly homeless. It is an inhumane ground for possession if we do not try to do something to provide alternative accommodation for the tenant, and the landlord should be involved in that.

I would be grateful to hear the Minister's initial response to that. I wonder whether something could be done to protect tenants who find themselves in what would otherwise be a hopeless position.

Mr. Waldegrave: We had a prolonged debate on this matter in Committee and some of the same arguments have been produced today. There is a division across the Floor of the House. One of the reasons why so little property is brought into the rented sector and why so much property that could be rented is left empty is that landlords fear that it will be virtually impossible for them to gain reuse of the property if major development proposals come up.

We are trying to strike a balance throughout the Bill. The Opposition are arguing that tremendous obligations should be put on landlords to take responsibility for the housing of their tenants even if they are leaving the landlord business and perhaps taking part in an inner city development, which would be welcome. That would prevent landlords from letting and, if they do obtain possession of a property, it would encourage them to leave it empty rather than run the risk of any further developments being blocked. That is where we must try to achieve a balance in the Bill. We believe that ground 7 is right.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) asked how serious the intention to redevelop had to be. I hoped that I had shown in Committee that the courts carefully consider the seriousness of intention. I quoted a number of cases from the workings of commercial law, on which our proposal is based, to show that if a landlord wishes to terminate a business lease for redevelopment he must show the necessary intention not only by saying that he chooses to redevelop but by having planning permission and contracts let, assuming that he is charging market rents. If he is making further lettings, he is already charging market rents and does not experience the same pressure to get people out as landlords with Rent Act tenancies.

Mr. Battle rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I fear that I will not convince Opposition Members about this matter. We believe that if we change the balance a little, properties will become available.

Mr. Battle: The clause is based on the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. Under that Act, compensation is paid to business tenants who are being moved out, so why is there no compensation in the Bill for those who lost their homes?

Mr. Waldegrave: If I remember rightly, relocation costs can be paid——

Mr. Battle: Removal costs.

Mr. Waldegrave rose——

Mr. Heddle: Does my hon. Friend agree that under the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 compensation is paid in place of providing suitable accommodation? It enables the displaced tenant to provide his own suitable accommodation.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is more learned about that matter than I am.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister say whether in all cases such development would meet the objectives on which he and his colleagues are so keen—the reletting of property for residential use? I see that an answer is coming from behind the Minister. Is it not right that development for commerical purposes may not necessarily produce further accommodation for letting? If so, it is not easily defended on the ground that it will produce more private sector rented property.

Mr. Waldegrave: If land is being used not for the provision of homes but for another necessary inner city development, it is more unfair that the responsibility for accommodating tenants should lie in every case with the landlord. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) passed me a useful reminder that the existing assured tenancy scheme includes a redevelopment ground.

Mr. Boateng rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: We have spent many hours debating this matter, but there is a clear difference of philosophy. We believe that the burdens on landlords have contributed to the decline of the rented sector. Much of the empty property in inner cities is kept empty against the fear of redevelopment. We hope that we have dealt with that problem in the short term.

If we go back down this route, we shall be contributing to the continuance of empty property, and I would not want to urge the House to do that.

Mr. Boateng: I invite the Minister to give the first of what I suspect will be many honourable mentions in dispatches to his parliamentary private secretary.

Mr. McCartney: Hod-carrier.

Mr. Boateng: Hod-carrier is too crude and coarse an expression to describe the Minister's PPS. He performs a useful function, though it is not as constructive as that of a hod-carrier.

Once again, the Minister has been writhing and wriggling. We saw the hand motions, the tugging of the ear and the engaging smile that we all came to know so well in Committee. He will have to do much better. If he does not, he will be here for many hours.

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that I hold the record as a Minister—certainly during this century—for a continuous sitting of the House. I am happy to continue indefinitely. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would unfold his arms, because he is wearing a most remarkable tie. With his arms folded, we are not getting the full benefit of it.

6.45 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts: We are not happy with what the Minister has been saying about empty property. Local authorities are the Government's whipping boys. The Government always try to blame the housing shortage and the number of people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation on the fact that waiting lists are growing and on the fact that local authorities have properties standing empty. They always ignore the private sector and especially the houses standing empty that are under Government ownership.

Over the past 10 years I have campaigned to get empty properties into use. I have been known to propose legislation that criticised local authorities that unnecessarily kept properties empty. I, unlike the Government, have always tried to strike a balance.

In 1986 there were 111,600 houses in local authority ownership standing empty, but there were 493,200 houses empty in the private sector. By 1987, the number of houses in local authority ownership empty had reduced to 108,600, but there had been an increase in the private sector figure to 511,200. During that period, the Government's Housing Act 1980 provisions and the shorthold-tenancy provisions were in operation. The Government said that they would solve the problem and that all houses that landlords kept empty because they could not obtain vacant possession would come flooding back on to the market. The Minister is advancing the same fallacious arguments in these proposals.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): As the hon. Gentleman has spoken in public in favour of greater use of empty property under different tenures and ownership, will he concede that if the Bill is passed without further comment about empty private property it is, none the less, perfectly valid to consider proposals for greater use of local authority property?

Mr. Roberts: As long as local authorities are not being unduly penalised or criticised unreasonably for not letting empty properties that could not be let because they did not have finance following the cuts in housing investment programmes to make empty properties available with the speed that they would like. I agree that we should be critical of local authorities that have properties standing empty unnecessarily. Simply to quote figures of properties in local authority ownership that are standing empty does not give the true picture. The Government quoted massive figures of properties standing empty in Liverpool. They were tenement blocks standing empty prior to demolition. Those figures were unfair and it was not right to pillory local authorities and make them the scapegoat for the Government's failure to allow sufficient houses to be built for people on waiting lists.

I shall give some figures from Sefton metropolitan district council. It is an important local authority and the constituency of Bootle falls within its boundaries. In Sefton 335 local authority houses and 113 houses owned by housing associations are standing empty. There are 6,333 standing empty in the private rented sector. That is a scandal in view of a waiting list of over 4,000. The local authority is doing an excellent job, even though since 1979 it has had a 78·3 per cent. cut in its housing investment programme allocations.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 294, in page 80 leave out lines 1 to 15 and insert—

'(a) the intended work cannot reasonably be carried out without the tenant giving up possession of the dwelling-house because—

(i) the tenant is not willing to agree to such a variation of the terms of the tenancy as would give such access and other facilities as would permit the intended work to be carried out, or

(ii) the nature of the intended work is such that no such variation is practicable, or

(iii) the tenant is not willing to accept an assured tenancy of such part only of the dwelling-house (in this sub-paragraph referred to as "the reduced part") as would leave in the possession of his landlord so much of the dwelling-house as would be reasonable to enable the intended work to be carried out and, where appropriate, as would give such access and other facilities over the reduced part as would permit the intended work to be carried out, or

(iv) the nature of the intended work is such that such a tenancy is not practicable; and

(b) either the landlord seeking possession acquired his interest in the dwelling-house before the grant of the tenancy or that interest was in existence at the time of that grant and neither that landlord (or, in the case of joint landlords, any of them) nor any other person who, alone or jointly with others, has acquired that interest since that time acquired it for money or money's worth.

For the purpose of this ground, if, immediately before the grant of the tenancy, the tenant to whom it was granted or, if it was granted to joint tenants, any of them was the tenant or one of the joint tenants under an earlier assured tenancy of the dwelling-house concerned, any reference in paragraph (b) above to the grant of the tenancy is a reference to the grant of that earlier assured tenancy.

For the purposes of this ground "registered housing association" has the same meaning as in the Housing Associations Act 1985 and "charitable housing trust" means a housing trust, within the meaning of that Act, which is a charity, within the meaning of the Charities Act 1960.'.

No. 19, in page 80, line 21, after 'landlord', insert 'or, in the case of joint landlords, any one of them.'

No. 287, in page 80 line 30, leave out from 'hearing' to end of line 35 and insert—

'(a) if rent is payable weekly or fortnightly, at least thirteen weeks' rent is unpaid;

(b) if rent is payable monthly, at least three months' rent is unpaid;

(c) if rent is payable quarterly, at least one quarter's rent is more than three months in arrears; and

(d) if rent is payable yearly, at least three months' rent is more than three months in arrears; and for the purpose of this ground "rent" means rent lawfully due from the tenant'.

No. 288, in page 80, line 37, at end insert—

'Ground 10A

Suitable alternative accommodation is available for the tenant or will be available for him when the order for possession takes effect.'

No. 289, in page 80, line 44, at end insert—

Whether or not any rent is in arrears on the date on which proceedings for possession are begun, the tenant has persistently delayed paying rent which has become lawfully due.'.

No. 290, in page 81, line 33, leave out '1' and insert '10A'.

Clause 8

NOTICE OF PROCEEDINGS FOR POSSESSION

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 7, line 4, at end insert

'and the proceedings are begun within the time limits stated in the notice in accordance with subsections (3) and (4) below'.

These two amendments are straightforward amendments to ensure that a landlord who serves notice under clause 8 that he intends to seek possession should bring proceedings within 12 months of having served the notice. This makes it quite clear that if a landlord serves notice he must have a genuine intention to start proceedings. He cannot serve notice merely to threaten his tenant. The tenant benefits in that he cannot have notice hanging over his head indefinitely. If the landlord does not start proceedings within 12 months of serving notice, the amendment removes the court's jurisdiction. These are sensible amendments and I hope that hon. Members will accept them.

Mr. Boateng: One can hardly see the benefit to a tenant of having this threat hanging over him for 12 months. Why not six months or three months? Twelve months gives ample time for a tenent to be threatened and harassed by his landlord. I see no reason, but perhaps the Government will give us one, for such an extended period to be given to a landlord.

Mr. Grist: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on the reason. In our judgment, 12 months is reasonable for both parties. Clearly one could pick a different period of time but 12 months seems reasonable.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 67, in page 7, line 12, after 'one', insert 'in the prescribed form'.

No. 21, in page 7, line 19, at end insert: 'and

(c) those proceedings will not begin later than twelve months from the date of service of the notice'.

No. 284, in page 7, line 21, leave out '1 to 3, 6 to 8' and inset '2, 3, 6 to 8, 10A'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Grist: I beg to move, amendment No. 22, in page 7, line 25, after 'of', insert 'service of'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 23.

Mr. Grist: These amendments to clause 8 are drafting amendments. When notice is served that the landlord intends to recover possession under grounds 1 to 3, 6 to 8 and 16 in schedule 2, the notice must specify that proceedings will not begin for two months. Amendment No. 22 makes it clear that the relevant date from which the two months starts is the date on which the notice is served. Similarly, amendment No. 23 makes it clear that it is the date on which notice is served which is the relevant date for the purposes of subsection 4(B). This establishes that the earliest date specified in the notice in the case of a periodic tenancy must not fall before the date on which a landlord's notice to quit would have taken effect if served on the date on which notice under clause 8 was served. These are straightforward amendments for the purposes of clarification.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 23, in page 7, line 29 after 'of', insert 'service of'.

Clause 9

EXTENDED DISCRETION OF COURT IN POSSESSION CLAIMS

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 8, line 29, after 'dwelling-house', insert '(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendment No. 25.

Mr. Waldegrave: Perhaps I may comment briefly on parallelism with Scotland because on this occasion we propose to make a change that has been made in the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988. Perhaps I may correct the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). The Scottish Bill does not make the three-months rent arrears ground discretionary. I should have known that but perhaps the hon. Gentleman should also have known it. We are moving in step on that matter and now propose to move in step on this matter.

The two amendments ensure that the court does not have the power to suspend possession or adjourn proceedings, as it does in ordinary assured tenancies, when it is considering a shorthold possession case. It may not adjourn proceedings or suspend execution of a possession order when it is satisfied that the landlord is entitled to possession on any of the mandatory grounds in schedule 2 to the Bill. Shorthold is a mandatory ground for repossession even though it does not appear in the list of mandatory grounds. It is of course a mandatory case for repossession under the Rent Act 1977—case 19. Clearly the court cannot have the power to suspend possession of a shorthold tenancy. It is the essence of a shorthold tenancy that the landlord is guaranteed possession provided he has served the correct notice. The amendments give effect to this, and I trust that hon. Members will accept that this must be so. It is logical that it should be so.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): These two amendments are small and technical and have been introduced by the Government at this late stage. Many of the amendments that we are dealing with could have been tabled by the Government much earlier. On a Bill related to the housing of the nation many Back Benchers who did not have an opportunity to speak on Committee want to speak on Report about the general nature of housing law. Unfortunately, we are constrained to sit on the Benches while a number of rather trivial technical points are introduced by the Government simply because the drafting has been inadequate. I make the point at this stage by way of protest.

Mr. McCartney: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) had sat down. If the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) wishes to make a speech he is free to do so.

Mr. McCartney: The points made by the hon. Member for Stockton, South were precisely the points that we detailed earlier. Perhaps he could tell the House how he voted when we divided the House earlier.

Question put and agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 25, in page 8, line 30, at end add 'or

(b) by virtue of subsection (1) or subsection (4) of section 19 below.'

Clause 11

PAYMENT OF REMOVAL EXPENSES IN CERTAIN CASES

Amendment made: No. 285, in page 9, line 6, leave out '1 or Ground 7' and insert '7 or Ground 10A'—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Allan Roberts: I beg to move amendment No. 227, in page 9, line 9, at end insert—

'(1A) Where the order for possession relates to a dwelling house in respect of which structural modifications have been made for meeting the special needs of a disabled person (whether or not the tenant), then, if—

(a) a local authority having functions under section 29 of the National Assistance Act 1948 provided assistance; or

(b) such an authority would, if an application had been made, have provided assistance, for making those modifications, the sum shall include an amount equal to the reasonable expenses incurred in making, in respect of a dwelling to which the disabled person removes, comparable modifications which are reasonably required for meeting the disabled person's special needs.'.

I shall be brief because the issues raised about this amendment were fully debated in Committee. This is a repeat of amendment No. 167 moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and debated in the House on Tuesday 19 January.

Hon. Members might ask why if we debated it in Committee it is being debated again on Report. There are two reasons for that. First, it is a very important issue and relates to the removal expenses of replacing a disabled person's special needs in a new home. We are proposing to amend clause 11, page 9, line 9 and that clause deals with the circumstances and arrangements made when possession is sought of a home that is in public ownership and where the tenants, the residents of the home, are being rehoused elsewhere.

The amendment is before us again because of its importance and because it is necessary to protect the needs of the disabled. When expenses are incurred in the transfer, they should be paid if the money is to cover the cost of replacing a disabled person's special needs in a new home. If the home that a person is being thrown out of by the Government has been specially adapted for the disabled by means of some grant or other under the National Assistance Act, or by the local authority, it is not right that the disabled person should suffer. Some provision should be made. It is before us because it is an issue of principle that will affect, not a massive number of people, but a significant minority, who are some of the most vulnerable in our society. Those are the disabled people who need the adaptations to their home.

The other reason that the amendment is before us is that, if we had debated it in Committee and we had been given an unsatisfactory answer, we would have voted on it and that might have been that. If it had been debated in Committee and we had been given a satisfactory answer and the Minister had accepted the proposals, that would have been that.

However, this is what the Minister said in Committee in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith:

"His amendments—if I have interpreted them correctly —raise a fair point which would need careful consideration. If the hon. Gentleman is content, we shall re-examine the matter and produce appropriate proposals."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 19 January 1988; c. 344.]

On the basis of what the Minister then said, the amendment was withdrawn. He has not re-examined the matter and produced appropriate proposals. It is another example of the Minister ratting on an undertaking given in Committee. Nothing has been tabled by the Government. There are no proposals here to protect disabled persons in the same respect as the amendment that we moved in Committee and we now repeat. Therefore, we ask the Minister to stand by what he said in Committee and accept the amendment.

Mr. Waldegrave: I strongly rebut the suggestion that commitments have been made which have been broken, as has been said many times. They have not. I remember putting before the Committee the normal three types of commitment that any Minister gives. First, "If we agree it, we shall do what has been said". There have been several examples of that this afternoon. Secondly, "We shall have a look and see whether we can make that work". Thirdly, "That seems to be an interesting point, and, without commitment, we will look at it." This amendment falls into the third category.

I am sorry if this is boring my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) who may not be interested in these issues. However, to accede to the hon. Gentleman's request, I am strongly advised by those advisers in my Department—and we have specialist advisers on matters concerning the disabled—could paradoxically have the opposite effect to what he and we want. I must say that I would not have spotted that the first time he raised it. Nobody will doubt that modifications of this kind are often crucial to disabled people. That is common ground between us. However, the work cannot be carried out without the landlord's consent. That would be severely jeopardised if the landlord was then laying himself open to having to spend possibly tens of thousands of pounds if he obliged the tenant to move later on. It would not mean that he would fork out that money; he just would not allow the changes to be carried out in the first place. Surely it is better to continue with the present position where the disabled tenant is entitled to receive grants for replacement adaptation when he goes to his new house. The hon. Gentleman will know as well as I that, under the home improvement grant regime, disabled people are eligible to a grant of up to 90 per cent. from the housing department, with social services departments meeting the rest in cases of hardship.

We have considered this genuinely and discussed it with our disablement advisers. However, if we were to accept it, it has the paradoxical outcome that it might make it standard for landlords to refuse the work to be done in the first place and, therefore, disabled people would be worse off. That is a strong argument against accepting it.

Mr. George Howarth: In theory, what the Minister has said sounds all very well, that the local authority housing department can provide up to 90 per cent. and that the social services department can top up the rest. However, most hon. Members will be aware that, if the capital allocation is not there, there is often a waiting list that can stretch to two years or more. The reality is that people could find themselves in the position of moving and having to wait for that kind of assistance for a long time, during which time they will be subjected to some discomfort and difficulty.

The amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) is in some way defective. However, the Government with all their resources and all the advice available to them could surely have found a formula that would have achieved precisely what my hon. Friend and others intended with the original amendment that went through the Committee. I am bound to say that I do not find the Minister's explanation so far entirely convincing.

Mr. Waldegrave: What the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) has said is perfectly legitimate. He is pushing to get improvements, saying that more money should go into improvement grants and the disablement grants that are part of them. That is the right part of the system. There are about £40 million worth of disabled adaptation grants awarded each year. Doubtless, he and also many of my hon. Friends would like to see more. However, this change, which looks as though it would help, will make things worse.

Clause 12

INCREASES OF RENT UNDER ASSURED PERIODIC TENANCIES

Mr. Soley: I beg to move amendment No. 180, in page 9, line 24, at end insert—

'(1A) This section does not apply to an assured tenancy which is an assured shorthold tenancy within the meaning of section 18 below.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 184, in page 10, line 5, leave out subsection (6).

No. 236, in page 10, line 7, at end insert—

'(6A) Nothing in this section (or section 13 below) affects the operation of any term of a tenancy which makes provision for an increase in rent (including provision whereby the rent for a particular period will or may be greater than that for an earlier period) by an amount specified in the tenancy contract or by a percentage there specified of an amount of rent payable under the tenancy.'.

No. 185, in clause 13, page 11, line 1, leave out subsection (5).

No. 181, in clause 18, page 12, line 42, at end insert 'and

(c) in respect of which either—

(i) a rent for the dwelling house is determined under section 20 below at the time the tenancy is granted; or

(ii) an applicant for the determination of a rent for the dwelling house is made by the landlord not later than 14 days after the grant of the tenancy and is not withdrawn.'.

No. 182, in page 14, line 16, leave out clause 20.

No. 235, in clause 20, page 14, line 16, leave out from 'below' to 'may' in line 20 and insert

'the tenant under an assured shorthold tenancy.'.

No. 321, in page 14, line 25, leave out subsection (2).

No. 322, in page 14, line 32, leave out subsection (3).

No. 323, in page 14, line 46, leave out from 'from' to first 'the' in line 47.

No. 183, in page 15, line 7, leave out clause 21.

New clause 14—Extension of access to Rent Assessment Committee—

'(1) Notwithstanding any provision in the terms of the tenancy, an application for the registration of a rent for a dwelling-house may at any time be made to the Rent Assessment Committee by the landlord or the tenant, or jointly by the landlord and the tenant, under an assured or assured shorthold tenancy of the dwelling-house.

(2) Any such application must be in the prescribed form and contain the prescribed particulars in addition to the rent which, it is sought to register.

(3) Subject to subsection (4) below, where a rent for a dwelling-house has been registered under this Part of this Act no application by the tenant alone or by the landlord alone for the registration of a different rent for that dwelling-house shall be entertained before the expiry of two years from the relevant date (as defined in subsection (5) below) except on the ground that, since that date, there has been such a change in—

(a) the condition of the dwelling-house (including the making of any improvement therein)

(b) the terms of the tenancy

(c) the quantity, quality or condition of any furniture provided for use under the tenancy (deterioration by fair wear and tear excluded), or

(d) any other circumstances taken into consideration when the rent was registered or confirmed, as to make the registered rent no longer the market rent.

(4) Notwithstanding anything in subsection (3) above, an application such as is mentioned in the subsection which is made by the landlord alone and is so made within the last 3 months of the period of 2 years referred to in that subsection may be entertained notwithstanding that period has not expired.

(5) In this section "the relevant date", in relation to rent which has been registered under this Part of this Act, means where on an application for the registration of different rent the registered rent has been confirmed, the date of that application or, if there was more than one such application, the date of the last of them.'.

'—(1) On receipt of an application under this section, the rent assessment committee for the registration area in which the dwelling house is situated shall determine the rent for the dwelling house.

(2) In making a determination under this section the rent assessment committee shall have particular regard to the right of the landlord to obtain possession of the dwelling house under Section 19 above, by setting the determined rent 20 per cent. below the rent which would apply had the letting been subject to an assured tenancy other than a shorthold tenancy.

(3) Where, on an application under this section a rent assessment committee makes a determination of a rent of a dwelling house—

(a) the determination shall have effect from the date of the determination;

(b) no further application may be made under this section with respect to the dwelling house until after the first anniversary of the date on which the determination takes effect.

(4) Where a rent for a dwelling house has been determined under this section, and the dwelling house is for the time being let under an assured shorthold tenancy; the rent so determined shall be the maximum recoverable rent.

(5) In section 20(8) of the Social Security Act 1986 (income related benefits) insert after "but"—

"(a) in determining the rent for housing benefit purposes the authority shall treat the rent assessment committees determination of a rent under section 20 of the Housing Act 1988 as the minimum eligible rent, and

New clause 36—Extending access to rent assessment committee—

'(1) Notwithstanding any provision in the terms of the tenancy, an application for the registration of a rent for a dwelling-house may at any time be made to the Rent Assessment Committee by the landlord or the tenant, or jointly by the landlord and the tenant, under an assured or assured shorthold tenancy of the dwelling-house.

(2) Any such application must be in the prescribed form and contain the prescribed particulars in addition to the rent which it is sought to register.

(3) Subject to subsection (4) below, where a rent for a dwelling-house has been registered under this Part of this Act, no application by the tenant alone or by the landlord alone for the registration of a different rent for that dwelling-house shall be entertained before the expiry of two years from the relevant date (as defined in subsection (5) below) except on the grount that, since that date, there has been such a change in —

(a) the condition of the dwelling-house (including the making of any improvement therein);

(b) the terms of the tenancy;

(c) the quantity, quality or condition of any furniture provided for use under the tenancy (deterioration by fair wear and tear excluded): or

(d) any other circumstances taken into consideration when the rent was registered or confirmed, as to make the registered rent no longer the market rent.

(4) Notwithstanding anything in subsection (3) above, an application such as is mentioned in that subsection which is made by the landlord alone and is so made within the last three months of the period of two years referred to in that subsection may be entertained notwithstanding that period has not expired.

(5) In this section "the relevant date" in relation to rent which has been registered under this Part of this Act, means—

(a) where on an application for the registration of different rent the registered rent has been confirmed, the date of that application or, if there was more than one such application, the date of the last of them;

(b) in any other case, the date on which the registration of rent took effect.

(6) Where a market rent for a dwelling-house is registered by the Rent Assessment Committee, the rent recoverable shall be limited to the rent so registered, and the amount by which the rent payable under the tenancy exceeds that limit shall, notwithstanding anything in the agreement, be irrecoverable from the tenant.

(7) Where a rent has been determined by the Rent Assessment Committee the rent so determined shall be the rent under the tenancy with effect from the date of determination or, if it appears to the Rent Assessment Committee that that would cause undue hardship to the tenant, with effect from such later date as the Committee direct.'.

Mr. Soley: We come to an important part of the Bill which deals primarily with rents, the way in which rents are set and assured shorthold tenancies. We do so in the context of the Government's central aim of the Bill, which is to provide an increase in the amount of property available for people to rent. We begin in the knowledge that the Government have so far singularly failed in that aim. We know that since 1980, when the Government first started to cut back on the Rent Act, no fewer than 1 million homes have gone from the rented sector, half of million of which have gone from the Government's much-loved private rented sector.

We know that the rate of decline is steeper than it has ever been, except when it declined so rapidly after the Conservative Government passed the Rent Act 1956. That was the steepest and fastest decline of all time. Most people know—including the Department of the Environment that has carried out research on the matter—that the majority of private landlords do not keep their properties empty because of Rent Acts. Only about 2·5 per cent. of people who own empty properties claim that the Rent Acts are a deterrent. The vast majority keep their properties empty either because they are intending to spend money on repairs or, more commonly, because they intend to sell them. I reiterate what I have said to the Government over a number of months. Until they do something about housing finance, they will not revive the rented sector. The collapse of the rented sector, especially the private rented sector, is caused by the absurd housing finance system in this country.

Mr. Winnick: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Soley: Yes, but I just say once again and clearly to the Government that we are willing to consider new ways of reforming housing finance in the recognition that any new or reformed system must be fairer both within the purchased and rented sectors, and between those sectors. Any reforms must be capable of being introduced in a way that does not cause economic distress to mortgage payers or to rent payers. We need to remember that in certain parts of the country there are more people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation because of mortgage defaulting than there are for other reasons.

Mr. Winnick: Ministers try to make excuses for what occurred under the Rent Act 1957, but there was a substantial reduction in rented accommodation in the private sector between the passing of the Rent Act and the incoming Labour Government in the autumn of 1964. Has my hon. Friend not read the proceedins on the Report stage and the Second Reading of the Rent Act, when the same kind of promises were made by Ministers, including Mr. Enoch Powell? They said that once the Bill became law, once deregulation occurred and landlords were not restricted, there would be an ample supply of rented accommodation. As we know, the opposite has happened.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is right to correct me. I said that the year of the Act was 1956 and it was, of course, 1957. It all has to do with housing finance.

My hon. Friend will know that the 1957 Act led to the introduction of the words "Rachman" and "Rachmanism" into the English language. No doubt, we will see that kind of thing returning with the Bill and all its works precisely because the supply of low-cost rented accommodation is drying up dramatically fast. At the same time, the Government are seeking to pass this Bill, which will make it easier for landlords to evict tenants. There will necessarily be an increase in the percentage of very bad landlords who use harassment to get people out. Such people are not really landlords—they are property speculators who want the property empty so they can sell it.

One need not look just at London because the figures apply, to a greater or lesser extent, across the country. In Dorset, for example, houses with two or three bedrooms sell for about £90,000. The average manual worker has a weekly wage of between £80 and £90. Surely nobody believes that such people can get mortgages to buy a house for £90,000. If, in the Secretary of State's famous words, "somebody has a spare house to let" in such an area and if that person knows that he can sell it for £90,000, he will also know that he can put the proceeds in a building society and receive about £200 per week in interest. One does not need to be an economic Tarzan to work out what the market rent will be in those circumstances. In areas such as mine, landlords expect to achieve a total of £1,000 per week in rent. That is what they can achieve either by letting the property as luxury flats or by cramming in as many people as possible, who will often pay £70 per week each and share a room. That is what is so fundamentally wrong. That is why the Bill will not work and why we have tabled this group of amendments.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that house prices have been chased up and are, as he says, difficult for ordinary people to afford, because such people cannot find anywhere to rent and are, therefore, forced into buying? The whole point of the Bill is that it will provide more opportunities for people to rent.

Mr. Soley: I saw the hon. Lady taking an interest in what I was saying. She has grasped the first point—that supply has been cut drastically—but she has not grasped the second point, which is that more new properties will not come on to the market. The supply of rented properties at the lower end of the market is decreasing.

Mrs. Gorman: Why?

at the lower end of the market is decreasing.

Mrs. Gorman: Why?

Mr. Soley: I am explaining why, if the hon. Lady will bear with me. In London alone, over half the lets are already outside the Rent Acts, yet the rate of decline of properties coming on to the market is accelerating; and that is because of housing finance. One can get more money by selling than one can by renting, without any of the hassle of being a landlord. It is no good pretending ——

Mrs. Gorman rose——

Mr. Soley: If the hon. Lady is going to say, "Let's take away all the hassle of being a landlord", I advise her that one would make eviction much easier and allow people to sell with vacant possession at a greater profit. If one then throws in the business expansion scheme which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced, enormous profits can be made easily by people who choose to go into that area of activity, often with no experience of being a landlord.

If the hon. Lady wants to go into this further, she is welcome to read some of the comments that I made in Committee. I warned the Government that they had made a fundamental mistake. In a way, it is a curious mistake for a Government who claim to understand economic forces, and supply and demand. The supply of public housing in this country has been cut by two thirds since 1980—from about 90,000 completions to between 26,000 and 27,000; housing association starts are more or less marking time; and supply in the private sector has increased only slightly. It necessarily follows that there will be a combination of house price inflation plus accelerating rents.

If the Government go ahead with the Bill, there will not only be more harassment and evictions, but rent levels will go out of control. The Government talk about dealing

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Does my hon. Friend agree that the end result of all the procedures that he has just outlined will be an increase in homelessness, especially in London? In Tower Hamlets, 1,200 people are already living in bed and breakfast accommodation. We have people sleeping in the streets and on the floors of friends' houses. However, under one schedule of the Bill people will lose their property if they have put up friends or relatives. In Tower Hamlets, we also have the notorious case of 10 Bengali families—66 people—sleeping in a church hall until today. They are now in bed and breakfast accommodation on a 24-hour basis because the children are in danger. Such things will be exacerbated by the Bill.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend is right that such things will accelerate. I am glad that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) also spoke out against what that council has done. We will all be presented with the problem of local authorities increasingly taking measures that will result in people living in church halls. People such as the Bishop of Stepney have said, "What sort of society does this?" They are right to ask that, because what is happening is appalling.

The Government try to dodge what is happening by saying, "What about empty council properties?" Local authorities have 2·5 per cent. of their housing stock empty. That compares with just over 3 per cent. for housing associations and just over 4 per cent. for the private sector. It pales into insignificance when compared with the figure of 6·9 per cent. for the Government sector. I warn the Government not to go down that road. We should deal with bad management, whether private, public, Government, local authority, housing association or anything else.

The Government cannot dodge their responsibilities. They put the pressure on the local authorities and made it virtually impossible for even the best local authorities to manage, but at the same time they cannot get their own house in order. The percentage of empty stock in the Government sector is twice that in almost every other sector.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): While we all deplore the fact that any property remains empty, whether owned by the Government, councils or in private hands, the fact that is uncomfortable for the hon. Gentleman is that empty council properties are concentrated in the areas of greatest need, in places such as Newham and Tower Hamlets. Opposition Members should seek to do something about that before complaining about the Government.

Mr. Soley: That issue is not a problem or embarrassment to me or I would not have raised it, but I have raised it and will continue to raise it in the media and to the embarrassment of the Government. Conservative Members are getting into difficulties because they cannot dodge the responsibility, not only for the figures for Government properties but for creating this situation. They should remember one basic fact. In 1979, hardly anyone was in bed and breakfast accommodation, whereas now the figures of the homeless in that position have literally doubled. In 1979, hardly anyone slept in cardboard boxes, except those with special problems such as those who were recovering from mental illness, alcoholics and drug addicts; in 1979 such people could always be found places—but not any more. Some people came to see me tonight in the House of Commons saying, "I do not have anywhere to sleep tonight." One could refer them to hostels and to places such as Centrepoint, but they are full. Such things have never happened before—and not only under Labour Governments. They did not happen even under previous Tory Governments. What have Conservative Members got to write home about?

Mr. Spearing rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mrs. Gorman rose——

Mr. Soley: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity of putting the record straight about Newham. Is the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) not aware that 1,000 flats in defective tower blocks count towards that total? Such buildings were forced on local authorities by Governments of all political persuasions. The Secretary of State persists in including Taylor Woodrow blocks in that total, together with empty blocks which are having to be cleared for improvement purposes and those that are unfit because we do not have the money to repair them because the Government do not allow us to use our own money. Why does the hon. Gentleman not insist that, when Secretaries of State make misleading statements, they bear such facts in mind?

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend is right. I do not want to stray too far from the point although, in effect, this matter is part of the amendment, but it is true that, more than any other Government, the Macmillan Government—the only Tory Government who at least agreed with the idea of building enough homes to supply the need in this country—told local authorities to cut corners so that they could erect as many units as possible. It is also true that the present Government have the audacity—this applies to what the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) said—to have between 40 and 50 flats empty for up to nine years in my constituency. Some are Victorian cottages with gardens and four or five bedrooms, but the whole lot is being bulldozed to make way for landscaping and car parking around Wormwood Scrubs prison. That is what we get from the Government who then say, "What about the 2·5 per cent. of empty local authority properties" compared with the 6·9 per cent. of Government properties when their only answer is not to put people into their properties but to bulldoze them and put cars and trees there instead.

Mrs. Gorman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I wanted to talk about bed and breakfast, before the hon. Gentleman left that subject. I was on Westminster city council as vice chairman of housing for four years. I should like to point out to the hon. Gentleman that the increase in bed and breakfast accommodation since 1979 has been affected by two pieces of legislation, the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and the extension of housing benefit to the private sector.

I witnessed the enormous increase in the demand for bed and breakfast, ostensibly homelessness, which was directly related to the fact that those two pieces of legislation encouraged some people to make themselves homeless, and others to take on accommodation that was vastly beyond their means because they were under the impression that the council would pay. We were constantly unable to meet their demands, so the bed and breakfast circumstances developed out of those two pieces of legislation.

Mr. Soley: If I were representing the Conservative party on the committee of Westminster city council I would resign. Certainly I would not admit it here, as it is one of the most appalling housing authorities. What it has been doing is quite criminal. Perhaps I should be careful about my words, but its actions are quite unacceptable. When it keeps properties empty in order to try to flog them off, instead of putting in them people who are in bed and breakfast, the hon. Lady has only herself to blame if she finds that she is picking up the bill.

What is so atrocious about that judgment is that until the Government came to power hardly anyone was in bed and breakfast. That is a unique factor of this Government. The hon. Lady is really saying, "Let us get rid of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act, and then, somehow or other, we will not be able to see the homeless." The fact that Centrepoint has shown in its report that no fewer than half the people who came to it had been in care and therefore have no homes to go back to does not trouble the hon. Lady. She thinks that they can get back into their cardboard boxes and stay there.

The amendments seek to do no more than to limit the damage that the Government are doing through the Bill. Amendment No. 180 ensures that rent setting for shortholds is subject only to clause 20, the assured shorthold tenancy procedure, and not to clause 12 which is the assured tenancy procedure. The assured shorthold procedure is, of course, at the heart of the Government's deregulation programme. It is as near as they can get to saying, "Let us do more of what we did in 1957. Let us go further down that same disastrous road.".

All new landlords have been given a choice. They can let under an assured tenancy at a rent which is negotiated between the landlord and the tenant and which has a slight degree of assurance above a shorthold tenancy—but is still vulnerable on the grounds referred to in the schedules to the Bill—or they can choose a shorthold letting with no security beyond six months but with a right to seek registration of an appropriate rent. The basis of the Government's thinking, as set out in various documents, including the White Paper, is that if they had assured tenancies, they believe that new properties would come flooding on to the market. There is no evidence that that would happen. It is their belief that because those people were letting with less security they should get less rent. But there is nothing to control the rent.

The majority of landlords will not use the assured tenancy. There is no point in doing so. If one is a landlord, it is far more sensible to use the shorthold tenancy and keep renewing it, as one can evict without going to court and without giving any reason after six months and one can charge the same rent. We are trying to limit that ability. The shorthold landlord has an absolute right to repossess; he does not need to give a reason but can evict at the end of six months, or an even shorter period.

Amendment No. 181 makes it necessary to have a rent determined for a shorthold tenancy, and if it is not determined an assured tenancy comes into effect. If the Government are serious about having lower rents for shorthold tenancies, they must accept that if rents are not lower an assured tenancy should result. It is meaningless to expect a tenant in a shorthold tenancy to apply to the rent assessment committee. First, what tenant will do that knowing that, whatever the rent assessment committee decides, the landlord will merely evict him? As soon as he makes that application he will be out. The landlord can do that without any problem.

We are trying to ensure a real difference between tenures. Amendment No. 182 and new clause 24 allow the rent assessment committee to determine a rent at 20 per cent. below the rent of a similar assured tenancy. The rent must also apply to the dwelling and not just to the tenant, because we must remember that the tenant changes. If the landlord was able to charge a lower rent and, as soon as the tenant moved out, to try the same trick again, clearly that would be unacceptable. There are many good landlords who are quite willing to honour the spirit of the law, but Conservative Members must grasp the fact—all the evidence is within the Department of the Environment—that all the evidence of abuse is in the private sector. It is very serious abuse and the Government's own inquiries have demonstrated that.

It is no surprise to find tenants of private landlords queuing up to get into council accommodation and housing associations because they know that they are better and more secure. That is why there is so much demand for those properties, yet, as I have already said, the supply is being cut. The amendment also ensures the critical point that determined rents should be eligible for full housing benefit, as the other clever thing that the Government have slipped in is that the tenant will not necessarily be eligible for full housing benefit so that the desperate cases that so many hon. Members on both sides of the House have received recently will continue. Elderly people, handicapped people and others will continue having their housing benefit cut dramatically and eventually having the Government doing an about-turn for a limited period in a limited way so that the rent losses are maximised to £2·50—it can be more than that in certain circumstances—for two years at the most and probably only for one year. I have had a case of a 65-year-old diabetic lady having her housing benefit cut by £10·81 per week, from about £40 a week to about £30 a week. What are people supposed to do at that level of benefit?

That is what makes the Conservative party a basically immoral party. Whatever it does it cannot square the circle that there is something profoundly morally wrong when the Government can find £400 a week to give to millionaires yet they cannot find £10 a week to give to an elderly person who is already dependent on state support. That is what makes them profoundly and morally wrong and that is why they will have considerable difficulty in justifying such an act to the British people.

Amendment No. 183 simply ensures that shorthold tenants retain the right to go to the rent assessment committee and that removal of that right would have to be laid before Parliament. If we consider it a right, it should be protected, as we have learnt from bitter experience that under this Government we have to provide such protection.

Amendment No. 236 applies the wording of clause 24(5) of the Housing (Scotland) Bill. I hope that the Minister will be able to say that it is one example of Scottish legislation which he feels able to accept. It empowers a landlord to insert a rent review clause in a tenancy agreement and state a percentage increase or a specific increase instead of using a vague clause about increases.

Amendment No. 235 is exactly the same as Government amendment No. 44 to the Housing (Scotland) Bill, but I acknowledge, and the Minister probably already has spotted, that that is a fallback position for us. New clauses 14 and 36 extend access to the rent assessment committee to protect low-income tenants in the private sector by placing limits on rents charged by landlords. We do that by granting access to the committee at any time and limiting rents for assured tenancies and assured shorthold tenancies at market levels. Without that, low-income tenants would be denied access to the committee in certain circumstances. Amendments Nos. 184 and 185 are consequential.

So long as the Government cut the supply, the crisis in low-cost rented accommodation will increase, the problems in the south-east will escalate and house price inflation will continue to escalate. The next Labour Government will reintroduce a system in which rents are set independently of the landlord because while there is a shortage of supply there can be no alternative.

I predict that the Conservative Government will learn from the bitter experience of other people's sad cases, as they learnt in 1957, that it is nonsense to apply a simple market mechanism to housing as though it was a can of beans—as a Conservative Member described it—and one could simply go from one supermarket to another if one did not like one's landlord. Housing and land are not in elastic supply. If the Government are busy cutting the supply, the crisis will necessarily worsen. We shall reverse that in due course. Meanwhile, in order to limit the damage, I ask the House to accept our amendment.

7.30 pm

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has rehearsed the Labour party's hostility, which is well known, to increasing the supply of housing by getting the market to work and to helping people who need help to purchase in that market. That is the difference between us. We endlessly rehearsed the arguments about 1957, in Committee and elsewhere. It is worth drawing the attention of my hon. Friends to the fact that in 1957 the position was different in many key respects. First, there was no proper housing benefit system and, secondly, the Rent Act 1957 proposed to deregulate existing tenancies. I know that some of my hon. Friends would like to follow that route, but it was not shown to be wise when it was undertaken.

The hon. Gentleman speaks as if the present system has been a success, but it has not. He speaks as if the Rent Acts have driven out bad landlords—the successors to Mr. Rachman—but they have not. We all know that bad landlords still exist and it may well be that the widening gap between fair rents under the Rent Acts and the values of property has provided a doubled and redoubled incentive for bad landlords to get people out. But I hope that we can look with more agreement later to additional powers which will help local authorities to deal with bad landlords. The underlying cause of them is surely that, once a property has a Rent Act tenant in it, it becomes extremely uneconomic for the landlord. That is the consequence and the cause of unacceptable practices.

We cannot and should not attack the vested rights of those with Rent Act tenancies, but we can avoid making this mistake in future. I remind the hon. Gentleman, who is learned in the history of all this, that between the wars when the regime was one where new lets were decontrolled, although rent control existed after 1919 and continued for most other lettings, 1 million houses were built for rent. That met a large part of the need at the time, which was not unlike that which we have lived through. It was a time of major social change, major demands for the mobility of labour and major structural changes in the whole economy. It remains a fact that Britain is almost alone among the economies of western Europe in having no viable private rented sector, and the Government's purpose is to put that right.

We firmly oppose amendment No. 184 on the grounds that we seek to return to a system where the landlord and tenant should be free to make agreements and to vary them by agreement. We also oppose new clauses 24 and 36, which would provide that a rent determined by the rent assessment committee would be the statutory maximum recoverable rent. Again, that lies completely outside our intentions. If the landlord and tenant agree to change the rent, they should be free to do so.

Mr. Boateng: Does the Minister not recognise the point that we have made time and again: that there is no way that one can compare the position of somebody desperate for accommodation with that of somebody going into Tesco or Fine Fare and deciding whether to buy a bunch of bananas? There is a fundamental difference between the two. Someone looking for accommodation is not in a position of equality with someone owning it. It is fundamentally unfair in the midst of the current housing crisis to expect such people to behave as they might in a completely free market. This is not the real world; it is a nightmare world of the Government's creation which they are imposing on the current housing crisis and which will make it even worse.

Mr. Waldegrave: The best world to move towards is that which I think the hon. Member for Hammersmith referred to on Second Reading, when he quoted Mr. Aneurin Bevan as saying that the best form of rent control was three families chasing four lets or nine families chasing 10 lets. If we can increase the supply, that restores the equality which the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) wants. In many parts, the pressures to which he rightly refers from his experience in London are not present and the market will work well. I am not for a moment saying that the solution to housing pressures in the high pressure areas will be solved by bringing up the private rented sector. It will make some contribution, especially where the market is under less pressure, but we must seek other methods, in ownership, shared ownership and the various forms of subsidised ownership in high-pressure areas. I do not disagree with him on that.

Mr. Battle: The Minister will remember that in Committee there was a particular case before the courts relating to Mr. Hoogstraten and that Members on both sides expressed anxiety about it. We were informed that the Government would examine the transcript because that landlord was cleared of all allegations which we might have thought were appropriate, given his practices. Our point was that the provisions of the Bill would make it even easier for that sort of activity to be undertaken and would not help to curtail it. How, as a result of the Minister's inquiries into that case, can he reassure us that we shall not return to the worst excesses of private landlordism?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is a little difficult to comment on a case when a jury has found a particular accused innocent, and I do not want to misuse the privilege of this House to do so. I invite the hon. Gentleman to read the judge's summing up of that case, as my officials and I have done, because he may be surprised by the outcome. Later we shall return to several measures, some of which will be welcomed by the Labour party, which will help to ensure that those unacceptable practices are made much more difficult.

At present there is no meeting of minds between us over this, but I hope that if over the next few years we can show that the marginalised private rented sector, which exists in many areas, can be strengthened by the arrival of new money, properly managed and providing good rented accommodation, we may find some meeting of minds.

Mr. Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall give way when I have finished this little section.

I have no doubt that the hon. Member for Hammersmith does not wish to see good accommodation from whatever source which meets housing needs being driven from the market again. He has challenged us to see what will happen, and I accept that challenge. This Bill, with its safeguards, will over the next few years bring forward more rented accommodation, which will benefit not only the most vulnerable people, about whom he is rightly anxious, but mobile workers, managers and others in the modern economy.

We reject these amendments. I will have another look at amendment No. 235, if the hon. Member will not then accuse me of having been disgracefully making policy on the hoof, but the other amendments go to the heart of the Bill and would destroy its whole purpose. We reject them wholeheartedly.

Mr. Bradley: The Minister said that he would give way, so I was assuming that he has sat down to allow me to intervene.

Because of the time element, we have not gone into detail on new clause 14 but, picking up what the Minister said about our thrust in Committee being to try to shift the onus back to give rights and protection to the tenants against the landlord, the purpose of this new clause is to redress that balance and give some rights and security to the tenants. If the Minister believes his position to be correct, that there will be voluntary agreement between landlord and tenant, why will he not accept through new clause 14 access by the tenant to a rent assessment committee? If he is correct, there will be no great demand for access to a rent assessment committee by the tenant because voluntary agreement will have been reached between landlord and tenant. If he is so convinced that that voluntary agreement will be arrived at, surely he should allow the opportunity for that isolated case, in his world, in which the tenant may want to go to a rent assessment committee for protection of his position.

Mr. Waldegrave: It might be convenient if, with the leave of the House, I spoke again later to answer that and other points.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister might care to add to the points that he will deal with the amendments in this group in my name, to which he did not allude in his response.

The Minister says that he believes—I am not sure whether he does believe—in deregulation of the private sector, the principal purpose being to bring back into use currently empty property. The solution to that problem is not in any way to be found in deregulating present privately let property. One of the mischiefs that the amendments that I have tabled seek to deal with in part is the suggestion that more property can be brought back into use by deregulating rents not only in relation to property currently empty but in relation to property that is currently let. Those people who are currently letting property presumably find that they are getting at least an adequate income by doing so; otherwise they would have stopped doing it when they had the opportunity.

If the Government told the House that their principal objective was to get empty properties in the private sector back into use and that they believed that less rent control was necessary in relation to that sector, their argument would be more credible. The Secretary of State, in a press release published, I think, on the day the Bill was published—20 November 1987—said:

"The legislation would allow landlords to charge market rents on all new lettings. This is the key which will help unlock the doors of over 500,000 empty private properties in this country."

If that was the intention then, the Government should hold firm to it and use this part of the Bill only in relation to property at present empty; they should not have a market place free-for-all.

I would argue that the Minister has a case for saying that the present fair rent system works in a very unfair and arbitrary way. Academic studies have shown that it works differently in different parts of the country and that one cannot easily get to the bottom of how it works in any one place. But there is all the difference in the world between keeping some form of licensing or control system and doing away with it altogether, and the Government are proposing here to do away with it altogether.

The amendments that I have tabled, Nos. 321, 322, 323 and 324—I apologise for my cold.

Mr. George Howarth: Send for Dr. Owen.

7.45 pm

Mr. Hughes: I am trying to ignore a malicious suggestion from my right. I might send for a glass of water. It would be slightly more useful at the moment.

Mr. Howarth: This water will be more useful than Dr. Owen.

Mr. Hughes: Thank you very much.

The amendments that I have tabled seek to make the simple case that there should be an ability to go to a rent assessment committee at any time. It is imperative, if people are not to be completely priced out of the market, that the ability to regulate rents, as well as to have acceptable property, is preserved.

I ask the Minister to address these amendments and give an adequate, and I hope positive, reply.

Mr. George Howarth: The Minister peversely touched on the real reasons for this Bill when he said a few moments ago, talking about the inter-war period, that the difficulty has been the effect upon the provision of housing and the mobility of labour. It seems to me that everything about this Bill has to do with providing greater mobility. Certainly according to the utterances of the Secretary of State that has been a key factor in the development of this Bill.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman)—who I see has grown bored with this debate and left her seat—started to probe some of these issues. The Government will not create a real housing market, for many of the reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) gave earlier. The whole burden of public policy is working to support owner-occupation and to make it so attractive that, no matter how they change the terms, the advantage of being an owner-occupier will be great. This policy will be working for the people who cannot afford to enter that market. The only way to create the kind of market to which the Minister so frequently refers is by going down the road that the hon. Member for Billericay started to advocate, and the difficulty with that—as the Minister knows—is that so many people would be left outside the market living under cardbox sheets on the embankment that it would be unacceptable to the country as a whole.

That is the kernel of the difficulty that the Minister faces: the Secretary of State wants to go down the market road, but the Minister appears to be trying to modify the worst excesses of that. That is why the Bill is neither fish nor fowl—although it is foul in another sense. It will not achieve what it set out to do, nor will it make the position of existing or future tenants any better. The Bill is a mess and should be taken back.

Mr. Winnick: We are speaking against a background in which less than half a mile from here tonight people will once again be spending their sleeping hours in cardboard boxes. There are many thousands of people in squalid bed-and-breakfast accommodation, not only in London by any means, and the amount of housing misery is worse than for a very long time indeed. Ministers tell us, of course, that they are going to help to resolve the problem by deregulation, making the market more flexible, giving an incentive to landlords to rent, and all the rest of it.

Market rents will undoubtedly mean that many properties will be let at sums far in excess of that which a person would pay if he were able to obtain a mortgage. It is precisely because such people are not in a position to obtain a mortgage or to obtain local authority accommodation that they find themselves in those circumstances. Last November, advertisements appearing in the London Evening Standard showed that some properties were available for renting, ranging from £130 to £140 per week. There were a few one and two-bedroom flats available from £30 to £70 per week. Is the Minister telling the House that market rents will be less than that? The likelihood is that they will be more.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) referred to the Rent Act 1957. As I said in an intervention, Ministers made promises at the time that the Act would allow far greater flexibility in the housing market and provide more rented accommodation. That is very much the argument of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). I have some figures for the Minister on which he might like to comment. Between April 1951 and June 1956, before the Rent Act, the private rented sector lost 800,000 dwellings, which was an average loss of 160,000 per year. Between June 1957 and December 1961, the private rented sector lost 1·3 million dwellings, which was an average loss of 236,000 dwellings per year. Those figures are from the report of the 1971 Francis committee on the Rent Act.

Those figures illustrate that the last time a Tory Government deregulated, far from providing more rented accommodation, they ensured that a far larger number of rented dwellings were lost. That is why we take the view that the Bill is unlikely to provide more rented accommodation. Once landlords know that there is no ceiling on rents and that market values are to apply, they will charge the utmost. We are told that regulated tenants will be in no danger. However, once the property owner recognises that, when the regulated tenant leaves, the property can be relet at market rents or sold with vacant possession, the incentive will be there for Rachmanism, alsatian dogs, and all that we associate with the Rent Act 1957. This week, the Minister has been publicising the Bill's provisions against eviction and harassment and for compensation. However, they will not be of much use to a tenant who is on the streets and unable to find accommodation, and who is in no position financially to obtain a mortgage.

That is why I and my hon. Friends believe this Bill to be totally inadequate. It will not in any way help those people whom I described at the beginning of my remarks, living in great misery and under stress in housing which is a disgrace to this country. We should at least provide certain basic safeguards.

When moving the amendment, my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith said that one essential safeguard related to shorthold tenants. I take the view, and it will be seen whether I am right or wrong, that most of the new tenancies created under the Bill will be shorthold. They will not be assured tenancies because landlords will take the view that their tenants should have the least amount of security. Why should they give them more protection and security? Tenants should have the opportunity to go before the rent assessment committee. That is an essential safeguard, and one that is far more important than the provisions which the Minister has been publicising this week. For that reason, I hope that my hon. Friend's amendment, and those grouped with it, will have the support of the House.

Mr. Boateng: I can be brief because I have been reflecting on the logic of the Government's proposals in the White Paper and the way in which they have been followed through in the Bill. I did not need to reflect long, because the Bill falls short when it comes to following through the minimal logic contained in the White Paper.

At its heart, the White Paper seemed to be proposing —and we saw in Committee how the Minister departed from this—that a distinction should be made between shorthold tenancies and assured tenancies. The logic of the White Paper, such as it was, envisaged a two-tier scheme, whereby the landlord chose between giving the tenant security of tenure and receiving a market rent or granting only minimal security but accepting a degree of rent control. As Government Members may have realised, the Bill does not achieve that. In practice, it is unlikely that there will be any significant difference between rent levels under the two schemes. What possible reason could a landlord ever have for granting an assured tenancy when he could grant a shorthold tenancy? The magic of the assured shorthold tenancy, from the point of view of the grubby little landlords whom the Government seek to placate with this measure, is that the only thing which is assured and short about it is the shortness of the assurance, so far as concerns the tenant. No sooner is he in than he will be out again, unless he negotiates a higher rent.

We want from the Minister the answers to three questions. They are all simple and it will not take me long to ask them. I hope that the people with notes for the Minister are ready to pass them down, although I see no sign of the hod carrier. First, what in practice will be the difference in rent levels between the two schemes? Will registered rents under the shorthold scheme be an average of 10, 20, or 30 per cent. below market levels? Secondly, why should a landlord choose to let on an assured shorthold tenancy? Thirdly, what incentive or protection will there be for a shorthold tenant to apply for his rent to be registered? In the last four or five minutes of this debate, may we have the Minister's answers to those three simple questions?

Mr. Waldegrave: I will end with the questions put by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), although they are not profound. The differences in rent levels will depend on the state of the market in a particular place. The answer to the question why someone should let for assured tenancies is that in many parts of the country, though not in large parts of the hon. Member's constituency where the market is in relative balance, house prices are falling, as the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) knows. That creates its own problems. In the areas where there is more housing stock than there is demand, people will be looking for tenants. The boot will be on the other foot. I recognise that in the places where supply is constrained, the Bill will not solve all problems. In those places there will probably be little difference between the rent levels in shorthold and assured tenancies.

As for the hon. Member's third question, the answer is set out in the Bill. The rent assessment committee can assess a market rent. That is what it can impose in those conditions.

Mr. Boateng: What about the second question? The Minister has moved ingeniously from the first to the third question. The question which he has failed to answer is why should a landlord choose to let an assured tenancy as opposed to a shorthold tenancy? Would the Minister do it?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member has suffered from a short attack of deafness. I answered that point. There will be plenty of places where the demand will not be of the kind that the hon. Member is used to dealing with in his constituency. There, tenants will be able to shop around. In those cases landlords will be competing to get good tenants. One thing a landlord will be able to offer is an assured tenancy. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. He should not base his judgment on the whole of the market or on the areas where high pressures mean that the landlord is in a seller's market.

New clauses 36 and 14, which are roughly the same, would both provide a facility for a tenant to apply to the rent assessment committee at any time rather than only in the specified circumstances laid down in clause 12. Obviously this goes to the heart of the principle that the parties should agree the initial rent between themselves for the entire term in the case of a fixed-term tenancy and for the first 12 months in the case of a periodic tenancy. That is why those amendments cannot be accepted.

As regards amendment No. 323, to require that the rent assessment committee's determination of a rent should in all cases be back-dated to the date of application would seem odd and unnecessarily rigid. Whether or not back-dating was justified would depend on the circumstances of the case. It would not seem fair that a landlord should be required to pay back substantial excess rent where the tenant had been responsible for delaying the proceedings. The right course is to leave the matter to the committee's discretion.

These are lesser matters than the matters of major disagreement between us. We agree that it is a major failing of the housing system that there are in the private rented sector about 500,000 empty properties; the hon.

[Mr. Waldegrave]

Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) quoted roughly the right figure. I do not believe that all those are kept off the market through fear of the Rent Acts, although a large proportion may be. All that the Opposition parties have argued is based on the premise that the system which they invented is working. It most patently is not. That is why we seek to reform it. We shall greatly help those who need homes by reforming it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 28, in page 9, line 34, at end insert

'and

(c) if the rent under the tenancy has previously been increased by virtue of a notice under this subsection or a determination under section 13 below, the first anniversary of the date on which the increased rent took effect.'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 29.

Mr. Waldegrave: As the Bill stands, subsection (5) of clause 12 provides that when a landlord has served a notice of increased rent under that clause he is precluded from serving a further notice for at least a year beginning on the date of service of the original notice. Bearing in mind that the actual increase in rent may not take place until some time after the notice has been served—for example, when the tenant made an application to the rent assessment committee and the committee exercised its power to defer the date of increase—the provision as drafted could create a situation in which a tenant is faced with two rent increases taking effect under these provisions in less than 12 months. It is wrong that that could happen.

On reflection, it seems to us that the 12-month limitation should more properly relate to the date of the actual rent increase rather than the date of service of the notice. That is what the two amendments taken together are designed to achieve. The effect will be to ensure that, once a rent increase has taken effect under the procedure in clauses 12 or 13, the tenant cannot be faced with a further increase for at least a year. Of course, the parties could agree between themselves an increase.

I hope that this amendment will be welcomed.

Clause 13

Determination of rent by rent assessment committee

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 10 line 29, leave out 'an' and insert, 'a relevant'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 31.

8.15 pm

Mr. Grist: As drafted, clause 13(2) provides that, in determining the rent under an assured tenancy, the rent assessment committee is to take no account of any increase in value attributable to an improvement carried out in specified circumstances by a person who, at that time, was the tenant.

On reflection, it seems to us that the definition of improvement in this context needs to be drawn somewhat more tightly. It would seem inequitable that, when a tenant carries out improvements to a property and then subsequently surrenders his tenancy, a tenant under a subsequent letting should derive financial benefit from such improvements by virtue of the rent assessment committee being required to disregard them in determining the rent under the later tenancy.

We therefore propose to add to clause 13(2) a broadly similar provision to that in the comparable section of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954. That will have the effect of confining the disregard requirement, either to an improvement carried out during the tenancy to which the notice of rent increase relates, or, alternatively, to an improvement carried out not more than 21 years before the date of service of the notice, provided that at all times since the improvement was carried out the property has been let under an assured tenancy and, on the coming to the end of an assured tenancy at any time during that period, the tenant—or, in the case of joint tenants, at least one of them—did not quit the property.

Amendment agreed to.

[Mr. Grist]

Amendment made: No. 31, in page 10, line 39, at end add—

'( ) For the purposes of subsection (2)(b) above, in relation to a notice which is referred by a tenant as mentioned in subsection (1) above, an improvement is a relevant improvement if either it was carried out during the tenancy to which the notice relates or the following conditions are satisfied, namely—

(a) that it was carried out not more than twenty-one years before the date of service of the notice; and

(b) that, at all times during the period beginning when the improvement was carried out and ending on the date of service of the notice, the dwelling-house has been let under an assured tenancy; and

(c) that, on the coming to an end of an assured tenancy at any time during that period, the tenant (or, in the case of joint tenants, at least one of them) did not quit.'—[Mr. Grist.]

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 10, line 50, at end insert—

'( ) In any case where—

(a) a rent assessment committee have before them at the same time the reference of a notice under section 6(2) above relating to a tenancy (in this subsection referred to as "the section 6 reference") and the reference of a notice under section 12(2) above relating to the same tenancy (in this subsection referred to as "the section 12 reference"), and

(b) the date specified in the notice under section 6(2) above is not later than the first day of the new period specified in the notice under section 12(2) above, and the committee shall make a determination in relation to the section 6 reference before making their determination in relation to the section 12 reference and, accordingly, in such a case the reference in subsection (1)(c) above to the terms of the tenancy to which the notice relates shall be construed as a reference to those terms as varied by virtue of the determination made in relation to the section 6 reference.'

(c) the committee propose to hear the two references together,

As drafted clause 13(1) provides for the rent assessment committee to determine the rent under an assured tenancy by reference to a notional tenancy, whose terms, other than in respect of the rent, are the same as those of the tenancy under consideration.

This amendment is designed to clarify the procedure to be followed by the rent assessment committee when it has before it a reference under clause 6 relating to the terms of a tenancy and a reference under clause 12 relating to the rent payable under that tenancy. The amendment provides that, when the date specified in the notice served under clause 6 is no later than the first day of the new period specified in the notice served under clause 12, and the rent assessment committee proposes, to consider the two references together, it shall make the determination of terms first and then proceed to determine the rent—as provided for in clause 13(1)—on the basis of the terms as varied by virtue of the determination previously made.

ASSURED SHORTHOLD TENANCIES

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 12, line 38, at beginning insert

'Subject to subsection (2A) below'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment No. 229, in page 12, line 42, at end insert

'and

(c) which falls into one of the following categories—

(i) the tenant was not, immediately before the grant of the assured shorthold tenancy, a secure tenant of the same or substantially the same accommodation, or

(ii) the tenant was not, immediately before the grant of the assured shorthold tenancy, an assured tenant of the same or substantially the same accommodation.'.

Government amendment No. 34.

Mr. Waldegrave: The amendments stem from an interesting and important debate in Committee where the issue was whether there was a case for a provision which would prevent shorthold tenancies from being offered to existing assured tenants or to secure tenants who transferred to private sector landlords under some scheme or another. We acknowledged that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) raised a legitimate point of interest and we said that we would consider it further.

I want first to consider the position of existing assured tenants. One of the basic principles of the new regime is that, once a tenant has been granted a full assured tenancy, he should have the benefit of long-term security of tenure of a kind broadly comparable to that currently available under the Rent Act 1977. We accept that an unscrupulous landlord might try to undermine that protection for the tenant by persuading him to accept a new tenancy that was designed by virtue of the shorthold procedures as a shorthold. An unwary tenant might agree to such a proposal without realising its full significance and thus forfeit his long-term security.

We believe that it is right to guard against that outcome by providing that a tenancy cannot qualify as a shorthold tenancy where it is granted to someone who was hitherto a full assured tenant and where the landlord immediately beforehand was the same person as the landlord granting the new tenancy. That is the purpose of amendments Nos. 33 and 34.

Amendment No. 229 has the same objective, but is unnecessary. Although I do not want to criticise, because the Government should have more drafting resources at their command, amendment No. 229 is slightly less generous because the shorthold prohibition would be confined to the accommodation currently occupied by the assured tenant. Under the Government's amendment, prohibition would apply to any property where the landlord is the same person.

Amendment No. 229 is unnecessary for an interesting reason. As the law stands, it would be technically impossible for a secure tenant transferring to a private landlord to be granted a legal shorthold tenancy. The landlord taking over public sector housing would not be able to grant legal tenancies to the occupants until the point at which he becomes a landlord—in other words, until he acquires a legal interest in the property. The instant that he becomes the landlord, he will be the landlord of an assured tenancy provided that the relevant conditions have been fulfilled under clause 36. There is a continuum. There is no time at which a shorthold can be inserted deliberately or by mistake.

By virtue of amendment No. 34, once the tenant has become an assured tenant, it would be possible for him to be granted a shorthold tenancy afterwards. There is protection and I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith will believe that we have met the spirit of what he is trying to do.

Mr. Soley: I must confess that this is one of the third categories of commitment from the Minister. He said that he would consider the matter and he has gone further and accepted our proposal. Amendment No. 229 raises questions about the secure tenancy. I understand what the Minister has said. I will think about his comments because this is obviously a more technical matter than I had thought initially. Obviously that precludes returning to this other than in another place. However, I understand what the Minister says.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No.26, in page 12, line 44, leave out from 'prescribed' to end of line 45.

No. 34, in page 13, line 5, at end insert—

'(2A) Notwithstanding anything in subsection (1) above, where—

(a) immediately before a tenancy (in this subsection referred to as "the new tenancy") is granted, the person to whom it is granted or, as the case may be, at least one of the persons to whom it is granted was a tenant under an assured tenancy which was not a shorthold tenancy, and the new tenancy cannot be an assured shorthold tenancy.' —[Mr. Waldegrave.]

(b) the new tenancy is granted by the person who, immediately before the beginning of the tenancy, was the landlord under the assured tenancy referred to in paragraph (a) above.

Clause 20

Reference of excessive rents to rent assessment committee

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 14, line 20, leave out 'similar tenancies' and insert 'assured tenancies (whether shorthold or not)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Government amendments Nos. 36 and 37.

Mr. Waldegrave: These amendments relate to the basis on which the rent under a shorthold tenancy can be referred to the rent assessment committee and under which the committee can make a determination of rent under that tenancy if it considers it right. The procedure in clause 20 as drafted centres on a comparison between the rent payable under the shorthold tenancy in question and the rent payable under similar tenancies of similar dwelling houses elsewhere in the locality.

The effect would be to require that the rent payable under the shorthold be considered by reference only to rent payable under other shorthold tenancies. That point was argued in the Housing (Scotland) Bill. We have thought more about the matter and have concluded that the procedure is unnecessarily restrictive. It would seem right that, in considering the rent under a shorthold tenancy, the rent assessment committee should have the freedom to look at the evidence of other shortholds and that of the generality of assured tenancies, whether shorthold or not.

That will provide a wider frame of reference against which the shorthold rent can be assessed in particular, bearing in mind that one might expect shorthold rents to emerge at a somewhat lower level in many places than those for full assured tenancies. The new approach would enable the rent assessment committee to reduce the shorthold rent in a case where there was no evidence available in respect of other shortholds, but where it was clear that the rent in question was none the less significantly above the prevailing rent levels for assured tenancies. It would be odd if the rent assessment committee could not do that.

The procedure as amended will of course still require that the comparison be confined to tenancies of similar properties in the locality, but the change will introduce a wider degree of flexibility into the arrangements for reviewing shorthold rents. That can only work to the advantage of the shorthold tenant who has committed himself to paying rent which is clearly unreasonable in market terms. I hope on that basis that the amendment will meet with the approval of the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 77, in page 14, line 27, leave out 'or section 13 above'.

This is a simple drafting amendment designed to delete from clause 20(2)(a) the cross-reference to clause 13. That reference is now redundant as a result of new subsection 20(2)(b) which was inserted in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 36, in page 14, line 36, leave out 'of similar tenancies'.

No. 37, in page 14, line 37, after 'locality', insert 'let on assured tenancies (whether shorthold or not)'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 78, in page 15, line 6, at end insert

'and, accordingly, where subsection (4) of that section applies, any reference in subsection (4)(b) above to rent is a reference to rent exclusive of the amount attributable to rates'.

This is a purely technical amendment. Clause 20(5) extends to determinations of rent under clause 20 the provisions in clause 13 regarding the treatment of rates. The amendment simply inserts into clause 20 the necessary consequential reference to rates similar to a reference already included in the corresponding provision in clause 13.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 3

Agricultural Worker Conditions

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 38, in page 84, line 34 after 'residing', insert 'in the dwelling-house'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 39 and 71.

Mr. Waldegrave: Again, I hope that there will be no disagreement over this amendment. Schedule 3 describes the conditions that must be fulfilled for a tenancy or licence to qualify as an assured agricultural occupancy. I am not an expert on this because when the Committee discussed these matters I was engaged in the same kind of activity as that engaged in recently by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley).

The agricultural worker condition may be fulfilled if the property concerned is occupied by the widow or widower of an assured agricultural occupancy on that person's death. Amendment No. 39 provides that a person living with the tenant as husband or wife shall be treated as a widow or widower in such a case. It brings the provision into line with changes that we are making elsewhere in the Bill by putting the unmarried partner on the same footing as the legal spouse.

Amendment No. 38 is essentially a drafting amendment to make it clear that, where it is a qualifying family member who may meet the agricultural worker condition, that family member must have been living in the property.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 39, in page 84, line 45 at end insert—

'(5) For the purposes of the preceding provisions of this paragraph a person who, immediately before the previous occupier's death, was living with the previous occupier as his or her wife or husband shall be treated as the widow or widower of the previous occupier.'

No. 71, in page 84, line 50, at end insert 'and'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Clause 25

DAMAGES FOR UNLAWFUL EVICTION

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 262, in page 16, line 36, leave out

'or any person acting on his behalf'

and insert

'(in this section referred to as "the landlord in default") or any person acting on behalf of the landlord in default'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 263 to 267, 269, 271 and 273.

Mr. Waldegrave: This important group of amendments deals with strengthened powers to deal with harassment and related matters.

Clauses 25 and 26 provide a new civil right to compensation for a tenant who has been unlawfully evicted by his landlords or the landlord's agent. The compensation is based on the difference in the value of the landlord's interest in the building with and without the tenant. In Committee we undertook to widen those clauses to catch cases in which the eviction was carried out by a superior landlord or someone acting on his behalf. That could happen.

The amendments discharge that undertaking. They will be of particular help in cases where the superior landlord is about to require the reversion of the tenancy and therefore might have a large financial interest in getting the tenant out. The amendments will ensure that in those circumstances the tenant can benefit from any increase in the value of the superior landlord's interest in the building as a result of the eviction.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I say a few words about anti-harassment in general as an introduction to this group of amendments. We must ensure that landlords who harass their tenants do not profit from it. There has been widespread support for the measures in the Bill to strengthen the provisions, and for the new right to civil damages. The amendments will reinforce the provisions to which I have just referred. We intend to introduce amendments to widen the scope of clause 25 and to extend the basis on which damages are assessed under clause 26 to include development value and to widen the new criminal offence of harassment in clause 27. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will probably welcome those amendments, although in some respects he may want us to go further.

All the amendments strengthen the Bill and I am happy to acknowledge that in part they are due to the constructive criticisms that were made in Committee by both sides, many of them by Opposition Members. It is right that I should acknowledge that my officials have had a great deal of assistance from Shelter, the private tenants rights group, the Association of Tenancy Relations Officers and the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. They have all made suggestions about how the Bill could be improved and, equally important, how it could be effectively enforced. Enforcement is important. We intend to mount a wide publicity campaign to tell tenants about the new provisions and about their rights generally. We must also discuss with local authorities how these matters can be carried forward.

Some landlords are so negligent in carrying out repairs that their failure to repair could clearly be interpreted as an attempt to drive out the tenant by neglect. In Committee I said that we intended to introduce amendments in another place. They have to be introduced in another place for reasons that I think the hon. Member for Hammersmith understands. They will strengthen local authorities' powers to get repairs done.

Some of the amendments will entail redefining the person who has control of the property in order to counter evasion. We intend also to amend the relevant sections of part XI of the Housing Act 1985 that deal with similar notices served on the owners of houses in multiple occupation in order to counter evasion of those notices by landlords. All the amendments will prove valuable in reinforcing the considerable powers that local authorities already possess.

Local authorities have powers, but tenants also have wide powers. It is not the absence of rights that prevents tenants from enforcing rights concerning repairs; it is often the cost and the fear of going to court. That is why we all welcome the proposals in the report of the Lord Chancellor's review body on civil justice, published on 7 June, for housing action as a low cost, informal method of bringing cases such as repairs to court.

Much of the disreputable activity with which these clauses are designed to deal takes place in houses that are in multiple occupation. Many of the poorest and most vulnerable members of society live in houses in multiple occupation, as our own research has shown. Local authorities have wide powers to deal with the poor conditions that are found in HMOs. They may repair them. They may set up a registration scheme to keep track of HMOs in their areas. They may impose management orders. They may also, where conditions are very bad, impose control orders. There is an environmental health adviser in the Department. He is touring the country and talking to local authorities to find out how these powers work in practice. It is clear that they could be improved in several respects.

My Department will be consulting local authorities and other interested organisations on a series of proposals to which we hope to give effect in the next Housing Bill. I think that I should be legitimately criticised if I introduced at this late stage a series of amendments that related to HMOs.

However, I wanted to address these points because a number of hon. Members, in particular the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), made a number of them in Committee and I did not want him to think that we had forgotten about them. We shall propose a revised definition of an HMO. We shall propose that the management regulations on HMOs that apply basic minimum standards should apply to all HMOs. We shall also make proposals for simplifying and improving the control order procedure. We shall consult local authorities on the means of making the registration scheme more effective.

I have mentioned the control order procedure. Our guidance to local authorities will make it clear that the control order procedure and their compulsory purchase powers can be used in bad cases of harassment. Some local authorities have already successfully used those powers. I hope that the effect of the new provisions will be that there is a reduced need to consider such draconian steps in future, but the powers are there and we shall make sure that local authorities realise fully how many of them can be used.

I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith will forgive me for straying outside the scope of the amendments under discussion. I am aware that not all the problems have been tackled by these amendments. That is why I wanted slightly to widen the debate and to let him know that in due course we shall be consulting local authorities on HMO improvements. I hope that they will meet some of the points that he and his hon. Friends raised in Committee.

Mr. Soley: The Minister has conceded some of the points that we made in Committee, for which I am grateful. He has also said that he is willing to take action on houses in multiple occupation. They are an acute cause of concern. We shall await his proposals. However, we fear that the Government have underestimated the problems that a tenant faces in taking legal action. If he is faced with the threat of eviction, that alone is sufficient to make him drop any action that is designed to challenge the landlord. If he is in imminent danger of being evicted and he is successfully evicted and made homeless, the chances of him being able successfully to pursue a court case, however quick and easy that process may be, are minimal. We have to bear in mind the changes that are being made to legal aid. Not all these cases will be dealt with under the civil system that has been recommended by the Lord Chancellor. If one bears in mind the proposed changes to legal aid, some people will be in acute difficulties. All the evidence is that tenants have great difficulty in successfully pursuing actions against landlords. They are often better represented and they have far more money and stability with which to fight their case.

It was pointed out in Committee that it is not sufficient to talk about powers for local authorities. We need to talk about their duties. If a tenant goes to a local authority and says, "I am being harassed," and the local authority says to him, "We are sorry, but we do not have a tenancy relations officer, but you can see the environmental health officer, if you like," the environmental health officer will say to the tenant, "There are only one or two of us; we look into health factors in shops and factories and we do not have time to pursue your case." That tenant will therefore be left without any outside support. It happens in case after case. That is why we should prefer the amendment that is to be introduced in the other place to impose on local authorities a duty rather than just give them a power.

We shall want to look in detail at the amendment that is to be introduced in the other place. I hope that the Minister will take on board some of our anxieties. I hope that he will ensure that local authorities have both the power to act and the resources with which to deliver that action, thereby making it effective for a tenant to go to his local authority. By doing so, he will make life in his rented home very much more difficult than if he had done nothing.

Mr. Squire: A great deal of attention was rightly devoted in Committee to the clauses that deal with tightening up of the action that can be taken against rogue landlords. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, there was concern about this problem on both sides of the Committee. What he has said today will therefore be welcomed both inside and outside the House. Any tightening up that makes it less likely that tenants will be harassed and driven from their rightful home has to be welcomed.

I have been a member of the board of Shelter for six or seven years and I am grateful that my hon. Friend paid tribute to the help that Shelter has given to the Department. He is sufficiently realistic to know that the help that is being given is unlikely to remove all the reservations that Shelter has about the Bill, but I am having fruitful discussions with Shelter about its reservations. It is an important step, welcomed by Shelter and by many other organisations in housing.

The Minister mentioned houses in multiple occupation. In many cases the position is so bad that we would again find common ground across the Chamber if the Government introduced legislation to tackle the very worst at the earliest opportunity as many people live in the most squalid conditions imaginable. I look forward to seeing the detailed proposals that the Government have undertaken to introduce.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 263, in page 16, line 40, leave out

'or any person on his behalf'

and insert

'(in this section referred to as "the landlord in default") or any person acting on behalf of the landlord in default'.

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 199, in page 16, line 44, leave out from the beginning to 'to' in line 3 on page 17 and insert—

(b) commits any act, or omits to act, or pursues a course of conduct which act, omission or course of conduct is likely to cause the residential occupier of any premises either—

(i) to give up his occupation of the premises or any part thereof, or

(ii) to refrain from exercising any right or pursuing any remedy in respect of the premises or any part thereof, and such act, omission or course of conduct is likely'

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take the following: Government amendment No. 295, amendment No. 200, in page 17, line 34, leave out from 'that' to end of line 39 and insert

'the act, omission or course of conduct was the only means by which in all the circumstances he could have secured the health safety and welfare of the residential occupier, or that of the residential occupier of adjacent premises whilst making the least possible infringement of any part of this section in respect of the residential occupier.'

Government amendments Nos. 296 and 297 and amendment No. 201, in page 17, line 39, at end insert—

'(7A) It should be a defence for such a person to show that the act, omission or course of conduct occurred wholly accidently.

Mr. Banks: As the Minister said, we are dealing with the provisions of the Bill that cover harassment and the illegal eviction of private tenants. Notwithstanding the Minister's remarks and the support given by his hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire), Labour Members do not believe that the Government amendments match the promises and good intentions stated in Committee. I do not deny that the Minister has many good intentions in that respect; as Tories go, he is quite a decent sort of fellow. That is probably why he is not going to last much longer at the Department of the Environment. I am sure that one of the main reasons for the excessively large gap between the end of the Committee stage and the beginning of the Report stage is that the Minister has been fighting the Secretary of State tooth and nail to try to give some semblance of reality to the promises that he made in Committee. He has undoubtedly won some minor victories. However, whereas the Minister says that the amendments afford private tenants protection against harassment and illegal eviction, we are absolutely convinced that they do not go far enough to realise the assurances that the Minister gave.

The Government are making much of their stated commitment to make war on bad landlords. I congratulate the Minister on his excellent manipulation of the press in his campaign recently. It would seem that his ability to get good publicity rivals only my own. I read in yesterday's edition of The Guardian, under the heading "Tenants Rights Strengthened", that the Minister was to give tenants new rights. Members of the press would do well to examine the wording of the legislation, which constitutes the enactment of the Government's promises. Of course, I understand that the average journalist was not at the front of the queue when brains were being handed out but if journalists read the Bill and the Government's amendments carefully they will realise that the Government's promises simply do not ring true. I believe that it will be just as hard to prove harassment and illegal eviction and gain compensation for the victims of those evils after the Bill becomes law as it was before.

8.45 pm

In addition, we should bear in mind the Bill's main thrust. It will decontrol the private rented market so that on new lettings landlords will be able to give short-term security under the new regime. They will be able to make shorthold lettings and charge market rents. When a landlord owns two houses side by side, one with a protected tenancy with a fair rent of, say, £40 a week and one with a new shorthold letting at, say £90 a week, there will be a temptation, although I put it no higher than that, to encourage the protected tenant to leave. Some landlords step well over that boundary of temptation and adopt courses of action deliberately designed to get the protected tenants out so that they can charge higher rents.

Hon. Members should bear in mind that that is exactly what happened in 1957 when the Government decontrolled the market in the Rent Act of that year. Many hon. Members have spoken of accounts of the promises and assurances given when that Bill was approaching the statute book. The 1957 Act did not cause a flood of new private rented accommodation to become available. As we know to our cost, and the Government now admit to their shame, it caused a massive increase in harassment epitomised by that evil person, Rachman.

When I spoke to the Opposition's amendments in Committee I began by quoting ministerial statements that showed, as I thought at the time, an honest intention on Ministers' part to tackle the problems of harassment and illegal eviction. On 12 January the Minister said:

"Bad landlords are in a minority but they form a significant group that must be dealt with."

He went on to say:

"We are agreed on the objective of trying to make life harder for bad landlords".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 12 January 1988; c. 73-76.]

It would appear that we were in agreement in words only because the undertakings given by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State that she would examine the concerns expressed in our amendments in Committee do not appear to have given rise to any Government amendment that really answers those concerns. I am not surprised that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has been packed off to Finland. I do not know what she is doing there; perhaps she is studying igloo construction in case there is another winter of discontent. Frankly, our proceedings do not really suffer from the absence of Madam Woodentop. She gave assurances in her hurried attempts to move quickly on to the next brief, to which she stuck rigidly. But perhaps it is rather inelegant to think of the Under-Secretary sticking rigidly to her briefs. She could not understand what was going on. She made promises, hoping that we would then take the heat off and in many cases, in our naivety and gullibility, we believed her, just as we believed the Minister for Housing and Planning. What a lot of trouble that has got us into Clauses 25 and 26 relate to a new civil claim for damages that arises if certain things happen: it must be a landlord or his agent who acts; the landlord or agent must commit a positive act; that act must interfere with the peace and comfort of the residential occupier; the tenant has to prove that that act was committed with the intention of getting him or her to leave; and finally, as a result of that act, the tenant must actually have left. When all those conditions are proven, a claim for damages arises. As the Minister said, that claim amounts to the difference between the value of the house with tenants and its value with vacant possession. The idea behind that, which Opposition Members fully support, is to confiscate from the landlord the profit from his crime.

We must examine, however, where private tenants' difficulties really lie. I am anxious that the two clauses that create the new claim for damages were frequently used by the Under-Secretary of State as a justification for not tightening the criminal law which we shall be considering under new clause 27. In implying that it would be easy for the tenant to obtain massive amounts of compensation by walking out of his or her accommodation and complaining of some trivial matter, she showed no understanding of harassment and illegal eviction. That is not really surprising, as she comes from Broxbourne. If she came to the London borough of Newham she would see what harassment and illegal eviction mean to people in areas such as the east end of London. As I said, the hon. Lady showed little understanding of the Bill. She certainly showed no understanding of proceedings in court or of the insurmountable difficulties that many tenants face in trying to get any justice whatever from the courts.

The amendments draw attention to the holes in the clause as drafted. One of the problems that we have identified is addressed in amendment No. 199. In the clause as drafted, the landlord must commit a positive act that interferes with the peace and comfort of the tenant and forces him or her to leave the accommodation. I have come across many examples of harassment in my constituency in which no positive act has been involved but the landlord has nevertheless managed to make life extremely uncomfortable for the tenant. I quoted many examples in Committee drawn from my experience in the London borough of Newham. I intend to give a couple more this evening. I shall give only the first initial of the surname but the cases have all come from our housing officers.

Mrs. O is three months pregnant and lives with her husband and child in two rooms in a house in multiple occupation. There is plenty of evidence that the landlord intends her to leave. He has sent letters telling her to leave. He talks loudly in the hallway to other members of his family saying things such as, "I am not having these people in my house. I will get them out one way or another." There are no positive acts that can be linked to that intention. For example, he insists on the rent being paid in cash and will not give her a rent book. The law as it currently stands obliges landlords to supply rent books only to weekly tenants. That is absurd, as I am sure the Minister would agree. That landlord has ripped off the wallpaper in the hallway, has refused to repair the toilet, which does not flush, has refused to pay the gas bill and, as a result, the gas has been disconnected. Indeed, the gas bill was so high that the local authority refused to use its powers under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 to restore the supply. The electricity bill was not paid but, in that instance, the local authority did step in to ensure that the supply continued. Only last week the tenant received a letter from the Thames water authority threatening to distrain for non-payment of the water rates.

All those elements of the harassment of Mrs. O are omissions rather than acts. As we know, courts are interpreters of the literal word of the law in question. They pay no regard to well-intended verbiage from Ministers in Parliament. We know that judges are not permitted to look at Hansard in order to see what was in the minds of Ministers. They would be hard put to find that out as regards the Under-Secretary of State. However, they cannot find out the intentions behind legislation. All they can do is interpret the words of the legislation as it is presented to them.

The first aim of our amendment is to ensure that omissions as well as commissions fall within the remit of the definition of illegal eviction.

Another case in my constituency which did not result in prosecution by the local authority involved a tenant who went into hospital during complications in her pregnancy. While she was away the landlord removed the toilet. When she was to be discharged, the landlord refused to restore the amenities. An omission is not an offence in the criminal law as it stands and, subsequently, no action was taken. The hospital could not allow her to go back into her former accommodation because of the state of it. Therefore, after contacting the local authority the council picked up the client as homeless. The much-maligned local authorities, with all the responsibilities they continually receive from Government, also suffer criticisms and attacks from the Government and journalists.

In the end, it is the local authority that has to pick up the mess created by the social and economic policies of the Government. For example, I noticed that someone was evicted from a property owned by the Prince of Wales. The spokesperson for the Prince of Wales—I am sure that the Prince would not have agreed—said, "It is not our responsibility. Those people were in the accommodation illegally and were squatting." That is now a matter for the local authority and they will be housed as homeless. That is the attitude that even so-called responsible landlords take. One can well imagine the attitude that will be taken by the landlords who will be encouraged by this Bill if it becomes law.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend agree that the possibility of harassment along the lines of the cases he has illustrated will become more acute? There are regulated tenants who, quite rightly, have the protection of the law under the Bill. However, once those tenants leave, the property will become deregulated and, as I said earlier, there is every opportunity and every incentive for would-be Rachmans to get the regulated tenants out. Once the accommodation is empty, it can be let at market rents or more or sold off with vacant possession.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend knows the Bill well and is an expert on housing. He is absolutely correct. I hope that he will spend some time pointing that out to journalists on The Guardian, who seem to be blinded by the Minister's charisma and ability to dress-up the unacceptable in a way that makes them believe that he has gained great victories for the protection of private tenants when he has done nothing of the sort.

I do not wish to confuse hon. Members by referring to the criminal law and civil law together as if the burden of proof in each case was the same. However, the definition of harassment in both has proved to have common problems when it comes to proving cases in court.

Another change proposed by our amendment is that it would include a course of conduct in the list of things that the court may consider, when taken together, to amount to harassment. A case in point occurred in Camden. I have quoted the case before. It involved daily actions of a landlord which wore down the nerves of a middle-aged lady tenant. There were instances where he peered through her windows, stored bicycles in her hallway, complained that she was opening the windows when they should be shut and that they were shut when they should be open. Not one of those incidents would amount to harassment within the definition in clause 25. However, put together they made that tenant's life hell. That is the sort of thing that landlords will get up to. If the Minister is serious about trying to do something about harassment and preventing illegal eviction, he should address his mind to such things. Such things are covered in our amendment.

The second improvement that our amendment brings to clause 25 is that, instead of requiring the tenant to prove that the landlord intended that the tenant should leave, it will be sufficient for the tenant to show that the acts or omissions that constitute harassment were likely to cause a residential occupier to leave.

I should mention Government amendment No. 295 which was tabled yesterday. Think about it, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We came out of Committee on 15 March and amendments were being tabled yesterday. What was the reason for the delay if it was not to try to blind us with the sheer weight of the amendments and hope that we would allow these things to go through unchallenged?

Mr. Boateng: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Banks: I know what my hon. Friend is going to say but I do not think I will be able to agree with him.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend attributes malice to the Minister. He might do just as well to attribute incompetence to him and those who serve him.

Mr. Banks: I knew that I would disagree with my hon. Friend. I do not think that the Minister is incompetent. He has many incompetent people around him and his boss, the Secretary of State, is a paragon of incompetence. I believe that there is malice in this. Before you were fortunate enough to come into the Chamber, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we had a great deal of discussion about the fact that this Report stage is not a Report stage in the way that we constitutionally understood a Report stage to be. It is a re-run of the Committee stage. We are considering many matters that were not raised in Committee. I do not want to open up that old wound again. I have no doubt we shall return to it later.

Government amendment No. 295, which was tabled so late yesterday, goes some way down the road that we should like to take. I assume that that is why the Minister was locked in some arm-wrestling with the Secretary of State to table it. We know that the Secretary of State considers the Minister to be an unspeakable wet and a weakling who should be moved over as fast as possible. On that score, the Minister has our complete support. We shall stand shoulder to shoulder with him to resist the Secretary of State.

Government amendment No. 295 removes from clause 25 the most difficult test of requiring the tenant to prove that the landlord intended him to leave. It still requires the tenant to show the landlord's state of mind and that the landlord knew or had reasonable cause to believe that his conduct would cause the tenant to leave. I am pleased that the Government have taken this road, and I hope that they will be able to accept the rest of our argument about the amendment.

I want amendment No. 200 to be regarded as drawing attention to the looseness of the drafting of clause 25. The Government have promised much action against bad landlords and have been getting an unfairly favourable press about it. When the Government's promises are analysed in the text of the Bill, they do not amount to much.

Clause 25(7) allows the landlord to raise the defence that he had reasonable cause to believe that the tenant had ceased to reside in the premises. Suppose the landlord waits until the tenant goes on holiday and writes a letter saying: "I think that you have left. If you do not respond within seven days, I shall assume that you have abandoned the premises." He might ask the neighbours "Have you seen Mr. and Mrs. Y?" Does he have reasonable cause to believe that they have left? I hope that the Minister will answer that question, because we need to be able to test the strength of the Government's intentions.

If the landlord has reasonable cause to believe that the tenant has left, he can change the locks, store the tenant's belongings and gain possession. This does not seem to be adequate law. We are asking for the defence that the landlord can raise to be restricted, first, to occasions when he can say that his actions were for the health, safety or welfare of the occupants or neighbours, or, secondly, to occasions when he can say that his actions were wholly accidental, as we propose in amendment No. 201.

In Committee, the Under-Secretary expressed concern that the landlord might need to disconnect services to carry out building works. The Under-Secretary had simple faith in the good intentions of all landlords. She thought that when a landlord broke down the door and regained possession he would do so merely as the act of a kind and charitable person to redecorate the house while the tenant was on holiday. I hope that our amendment will address this problem. It clearly states that where works are necessary to safeguard "the health, safety and welfare" of the occupiers or neighbours, that will be an absolute defence to a claim for compensation.

Government amendments Nos. 296 and 297 also apply to this part of the Bill.

Harassment and illegal evictions are evils that strike at the heart of a tenant's well-being, comfort, health and security. A person cannot possibly concentrate on work, study, family or leisure if he is constantly in fear of losing his home because of unscrupulous speculation by his landlord. There are many bad landlords. We give examples of only one or two of them, such as Rachman. Rachmanism is alive and well and living in the east end and other parts of London. Indeed, he will thrive and prosper because of the Bill,

If the Minister and the Government are sincere in their wish to control unscrupulous landlords, they should recognise the failings of their proposals to deal with them and honour the commitments that the Minister gave time after time in Committee to strengthen the powers of the law to control the activities of such undesirable people. The Bill will give free rein to bad landlords

Mr. Simon Hughes: The case for strong law against bad landlords is overwhelming. It is more overwhelming when the rewards to be gained by them are greater. That is the reality of part 1 of the Bill. It will allow landlords to let at enormous rents and to obtain complete possession for development without the courts having discretion. Unless we have completely sound regulations, they will be able to continue to get away with harassment.

The debate is about one issue—where one draws the line in relation to harassment. Amendment No. 199 effectively makes the test objective. It suggests that we insert into clause 25 words that will enable the court to judge whether the act, omission or course of conduct of the landlord is likely to cause somebody to depart.

By contrast, Government amendment No. 95, which I accept is a slight improvement, leaves the test in the mind and therefore subjective in terms of the landlord. The court would still have to find that the landlord knew or had reasonable cause to believe that his conduct was likely to be effective harassment of the tenant.

Absentee landlords or those employing agents or a series of people to "look after" their property could still get away with the sort of activity that I hope the whole House would condemn. That will happen if we do not have a much harder objective test. Although I accept and welcome the concession, a harsher and more objective test is still compatible with what the Minister would wish to see.

Some people leave premises not because of one horrendous event. They do not leave because the landlord came in and issued a single overwhelming threat; nor do they leave because of an incident in the middle of the night. Many of them leave as a result of the cumulative effect of the unacceptable behaviour of the landlord or his agents. Our key task is to make sure we give the courts power to say that any interference with what the common law of England calls the quiet enjoyment of tenants is unacceptable and should allow action and criminal proceeding to be taken against the landlord.

Mr. Boateng: One of the great evils of the legislation that we are considering and which we mulled over for many hours in Committee is not only that it fails to address the difficulties and problems in establishing sufficient grounds to secure conviction in the case of alleged harassment, but that it creates an atmosphere and an environment in which there is every incentive in terms of profit for the bad landlord to flourish. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) showed that quite clearly in his speech. It is in that context that we must look at the amendment and the evil and the mischief that it seeks to address.

When we do that we talk often about Rachman and hark back to a period in the 1950s and 1960s when that landlord was at the height of his infamy. In doing that we overlook the fact that many modern Rachmans are out and about and doing their work in London—even without the provisions in the Bill. That gives us cause for concern about what they are likely to do if the Bill becomes law. If we are unable effectively to control them at present, how can we control them when they are unleashed with the expectation of the profit that the Bill holds out to them?

No doubt the Minister of State has brought forward his safeguards in all good faith, but they will have very little effect. The constraints that exist in the Bill as it stands will not be sufficient to restrain bad landlords. While not going into areas that have already been examined by a jury, it is right that we should name and expose those who are in the business of exploiting and oppressing their tenants—the modern successors to Rachman.

It is right that I should name in this place the landlord who is by far the worst. He is a man called Hoogstraten, who has terrorised a whole section of our community in London by his actions. In relation to the particular incident that I shall relate to the House, I am indebted to the London Housing Forum for its excellent publication "Speaking Out", which gives a voice to the people of London in exposing men such as Hoogstraten. Ms. H, whose case I shall refer to, is entitled to be heard. We must learn lessons from her experience:

"Ms. H moved to her flat in Edgware Road, Westminster, as a short-term leaseholder only to discover that her head leaseholder was the notorious Hoogstraten.

The dispute between them began when the head leaseholder claimed rights over the garden area which has exclusively been used by the occupiers of Ms. H's present flat for the last 20 years, and is included on the land registry map of her flat".

Mr. Hoogstraten has a henchman named Bradshaw, who "acquired the flat below Ms. H by harassing an elderly man out of the property, who still continued to pay rent, even until his death, though he was not living there. Harassment to persuade Ms. H to give up her rights to the garden then began."

All they wanted was her garden. They had to harass this woman of 20 years' occupancy to get it. Ms. H says this about Mr. Hoogstraten:

"Hoogstraten pushed me and spat in my face, he then pushed me towards my garden door. He accused me of being a prostitute, a cow and a slut. Mr. Bradshaw then said, 'I am moving down there' and pointed to flat A. He also said, 'when I move in your life won't be worth living'. I was in a state of shock."

Since that initial meeting between Ms. H, Bradshaw and Hoogstraten,

"other threats and incidents occurred. These have included threats of her 'ending up in a wheelchair', being nailed into her flat with 8" nails, with threats of 'cementing her in' to follow. 'Bradshaw was constantly banging on my window and doors and threatening me'. One time Bradshaw started piling furniture up outside her backdoor. Ms. H and a friend tried photographing these events by climbing up on to the roof. Bradshaw spotted them and hurled a massive slab of concrete at them. They turned and ducked but it hurt Mr. W's hand, who was consequently badly injured."

Ms. H further said:

"Ever since I met Mr. Hoogstraten and Mr. Bradshaw, I have been in constant fear of their action. I believe their conduct is designed to make me surrender my right to use the rear garden and even to induce me to leave my flat and live elsewhere. As a result of the actions of these two men I have stayed away from my home, lodging with friends, initially for about 6 weeks, and then returning to the flat for a short time only. In addition since the incidents began my health has suffered and most recently has been worsened because of the stress and fear I have to endure."

I do not believe for one moment that Ms. H is alone in her complaints against Hoogstraten. There will also be complaints against all the mini-Hoogstratens in our metropolis.

Finally, someone from Westminster council went to examine her flat. When he met Bradshaw, what did Bradshaw do? Men such as Bradshaw and Hoogstraten are so arrogant in their activities in our city that Bradshaw spat in the face of the representative of Westminster city council.

Following this particular incident, two years after all this began, Westminster council at last took action. However, it failed properly to draft the charge. As a result of that, it dropped the case. Ms. H says:

"I was completely devastated because if we'd got a conviction you feel like you've got protection, but this is like saying that nothing has happened, so carry on harassing".

That was Ms. H's experience as she told it to the inquiry of the London Housing Forum. It highlights the Hoogstratens and Bradshaws of this world. Something should be done about such people. They should be named in our newspapers. All sorts of things appear in our newspapers, but not often enough the names of the Hoogstratens and Bradshaws. They should be exposed.

9.15 pm

That evidence not only reveals the activities of those people but says something about the need to ensure that local authorities are in a proper position to respond to such evils and that they get their act together, not only in terms of efficiency, but in terms of the way in which such matters are prosecuted and the zeal with which they are prosecuted, and to ensure that they have the resources to do that.

The reality is that, whatever we pass tonight and even if the Bill is amended at this late stage by the Minister of State accepting our amendment as we urge him to do in London and throughout the country, legal departments, tenancy relations departments and the sections of housing departments that deal specifically with the private sector are being cut, cut and cut again. Unless that is stopped, there is no hope of even putting people in the appalling bed-and-breakfast accommodation in which council's are obliged to place them.

The Minister of State has had cause to say good things about my borough and about the way in which it tries to deal with the problem of homelessness. However, in my borough, the section of the council that deals with private sector housing is facing a cut of more than 60 per cent. in its budget and in the resources that are available to the council for dealing with the problems of private tenants. That is the result of the Government's policies relating to local authorities and their resources. The least that the Government can do on behalf of the people who suffer harassment in the private sector is accept our amendment. We would then not only have rhetoric against the Hoogstratens and the Bradshaws of this world; we would have action also.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) have provided an incontrovertible case for accepting what is, after all, only a modest change to the provisions whereby acts of omission can be included in the court proceedings.

I want to put to the Minister and the House what I believe to be the bare bones of the situation. They must be spelt out because hon. Members and anybody who has listened to the debate must have been gripped by the examples that have been given by my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-West and for Brent, South of the relatively small incentives that exist for landlords to get people out of their accommodation.

Clearly, the purpose behind the Bill is greatly to enlarge the differentials between different types of tenure and, therefore, automatically greatly to increase the incentives to people who may be able to change the tenure of one piece of accommodation with a sitting tenant. Those will be the results if the Bill is enacted. That is the logic of the Bill, which, as we demonstrated in Committee, does not provide or encourage the building of any further accommodation. Therefore, the differentials will increase and the premium on a "void", as I believe it is technically known in the housing world, will be that much greater. If I can use a well-known word to the Government, the return or reward for "enterprise" will be vastly enhanced.

I started to be involved in politics at a constituency level before the Milner Holland report and before the operations of Mr. Rachman and his cohorts were halted. I hope that the Minister will tell us how far the recommendations of that report will be covered by the Bill. The matter may have been discussed in Committee, but unless the findings of the Milner Holland committee are properly covered, and I very much doubt that they were, what is to prevent a return of the terrible things that happened in the late 1950s which were uncovered by that report?

I remind the Government that much of the Rachman operation happened in north Kensington, a place where political questions will be raised and choices made very shortly. It will be a good thing for some people to look at the Milner Holland report and see what was going on then. Will the Minister say whether the new law will cover the recommendations of that report?

I was involved in trying to help people who were being harassed. My hon. Friends have mentioned one or two examples. All sorts of relatively small things can happen. If I were a landlord, I might well be able to tell the tenant that I wanted to inspect the property or come in to see whether I was going to put in some new cupboards. I might go along at 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock at night or send along someone to whom I had given a letter of authority.

There are terrible problems with multi-occupancy. Multi-occupancy may not be quite as common as it once was, but many council houses still in municipal ownership which were bought up quite properly to house the homeless are multi-occupied and if they revert to private ownership, multi-occupancy and the evils that go with it in respect of harassment will return. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South said, when there is multi-occupancy and an interest, all sorts of curious things can happen. Faults can occur in electricity supplies and gas taps and appliances are mysteriously switched on. Dustbins are sometimes overturned.

Some of us could just about cope with that, but the problem is that such landlords go for elderly people, and often elderly women living alone. They were the victims and I fear that they may be again. Cisterns mysteriously and constantly overflow, not always outside down the pipe; water comes down in awkward places at awkward times. I am giving a list of only some of the more obvious things. I do not want to take various ideas too far, but such actions were rife years ago and they still happen in certain places. Those are milder forms of harassment.

Mr. McCartney: In my constituency there is a Rachman landlord called Mr. Morrissey who owns houses in Platt Bridge and Abram. He recently had the electricity cut off to a multi-occupancy housing arrangement. When the residents approached me and the local authority for assistance, and the electricity board was called in to investigate, it was discovered that that Rachman landlord had attached the electricity to the outside street lamp and had been fiddling the electricity board, despite the fact that some tenants had been paying money into a meter in some rooms and other tenants had been paying him cash each week. The local authority stepped in in an emergency. Families and elderly people were without heating and lighting and without any basics because of the Rachmanlike activity of such a landlord. Unless the Government give the amendments active consideration, I suspect that that will continue and increase.

Mr. Spearing: I am afraid that my hon. Friend is right.

My second point is that in east London where the City style of living is moving eastwards, the differential between born and bred Londoners in traditional communities and people who are able to afford higher rents is becoming increasingly acute.

The London Docklands development corporation is producing luxury developments on the opposite side of the road to large council estates. Many people, particularly those in Newham, will not necessarily take up such opportunities, if they get them. The original landlords may be all right, but we do not know to whom they will sell. A filtering mechanism is written into the Bill, but only for the initial landlord. As far as I know, there is nothing for years to come about changes in the ownership of premises which are initially sold to approved persons. The constraints that the Minister thinks he has in the Bill may operate for owner No. 1, but as the property market zooms on, as it might well do, what is to prevent owners Nos. 3 and 4 from being of a different character? No legislation produced by this House or the other place could prevent a decline in standards in that respect.

Where there is a change of living style, the incentive for people to adopt even relatively mild practices grows greater. Accidents happen to cars, dogs appear in the street, people return to find windows broken and even the safety of children is in question. That is the sort of rag-bag private enterprise that we do not wish to see and I am sure that the Minister does not wish to see it either.

In view of the framing of the Bill and the way economics work, the Minister must include much stronger protection in the law, and I do not believe that he is doing so. Therefore, he should accept the Opposition amendment. Unless he does, the protections that he has in mind will not only not do the job now, but will not even move in that direction.

I have been having meetings with constituents about the Bill and at one somebody said, "What will the Government have us do? Camp out in Epping Forest?" Unless we are to have that, we must have the protections because we want to keep our traditional community in east London. Unless those protections are included in the Bill, there will be big trouble indeed.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I was not a member of the Committee but I should like to say a few words about harassment and the problems facing private tenants.

My constituency has enormous housing stress, high unemployment and, paradoxically, an incredibly rapid increase in land and house prices. We are facing the sort of problem that we thought had gone away in the mid-1970s when protection from eviction, rent controls and protection of private tenants were introduced. Now we have such rapidly increasing house prices that landlords, who previously were relatively happy to let out part or all of their house as bed-sits, realise that they can make an absolute killing by evicting tenants or encouraging them to leave, and selling the property for redevelopment into so-called luxury flats, often of inferior workmanship.

Whatever the Minister may say about the codes of practice, recommendations and advice that he would give to landlords, he is deliberately encouraging a market economy and a property boom in London and the south-east. The victims are private tenants who are forced out of places where they have often lived for many years. If, instead of going straight home in his ministerial car tonight, the Minister stopped by Charing Cross station or crossed the bridge to Waterloo station and asked some of the poor people sleeping in cardboard boxes tonight, which is not a cold night, why they became homeless, he would find that many had had private tenancies which they lost. Because they were single people they were not eligible for rehousing by the appropriate local authority under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. They then went to bed and breakfast accommodation or tried to get lodgings of other sorts, and could not afford it. The property boom caught up with them and they were forced out of yet another place. Eventually they ended up homeless, sleeping on the streets, an absolute disgrace to this country and to the Government who put them on to the streets in the first place.

I hope that the Minister will recognise that, unless the tightest and strongest form of protection is given to all private tenants, as long as this property boom lasts they are the people who are vulnerable. It is not the articulate, able people who are able to use the law and get advice who suffer most. As my hon. Friends the Members for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) and Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) have pointed out, it is often the old, the single and the vulnerable who are eased out by landlords, possibly in breach of existing law and of this law, because local authorities lack the resources to give them the back-up necessary and advice bureaux and law centres are under pressure for lack of funding. These are the people who are the victims of a horrible mixture of public spending cuts that take away the carefully constructed support mechanisms of the past 20 years and encourage a property boom in which such people are discarded, considered worthless and left to sleep on the streets.

The country deserves better of the House than to have those protections taken away. The House owes the people absolute and total protection from the ruthless Rachmans who are at this very moment licking their fingers with glee because they know that once this Bill has gone through, once the Finance Bill has gone through and once the business expansion scheme gravy train has got going they will make a fortune out of the misery of people living in private rented accommodation and soon to become unprotected, many of whom will end up living on the streets. Is that the kind of city and the kind of Government of which the Minister ought to be proud to be a member?

I hope that the House will support the Opposition's amendment and understand that we are serious about protecting the most vulnerable in our society, who at the moment are private sector tenants.

Mr. Waldegrave: No one doubts the sincerity or passion of many Opposition Members in drawing attention to the abuses which exist. It was—perhaps unusually for me—the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) who seemed to put his finger on the problem and in some sense to knock down one of the arguments put forward by some of his hon. Friends, including the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), because these abuses are happening now. They are a product of the fact that for those renting accommodation there is no way of getting a return except by selling with vacant possession. That means that the minority of ruthless and wicked landlords follow that route, because they, like other landlords who do not follow that route, value vacant possession above all.

I am not arguing that the change in this Bill in itself makes this position either better or worse. It is the gap between the value of the property if the potentially statutorily protected tenant is not there and a free market that causes either loss if the landlord behaves well, or abuse if the landlord behaves badly. I will not disagree about that, but it is not logical to argue that by making it profitable for there to be private rented accommodation at market rents one is making matters worse. In the constituency of the hon. Member for Walsall, North and in the constituency of Newham——

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I think that the hon. Member had quite a good go—or any other area where house prices are moving up quickly these pressures are brought to bear. The only way to deal with them is to try to provide for the people in those areas who need housing within the housing association or council sector at rents that can be afforded. But that need is not met, as his party has shown since Milner Holland, by rent control, because this has produced these problems.

I am not going to be so rash as to refer off the top of my head to all the recommendations of Milner Holland. However, insofar as those recommendations were carried into force in the Labour Government's 1965 Act, we are going further in a number of respects, and that will be welcomed.

Mr. Winnick: It is perfectly true, as the Minister said, that abuses already occur. My hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) gave that as one reason for homelessness. However, does the Minister not recognise that he will make the situation worse, and that the incentive for abuse will be even greater? If a property can be re-let at market rent once a regulated tenant leaves, there will be a tremendous incentive for would-be Rachmans.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Walsall, North has missed the point. As his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, that incentive already exists. If anything, that incentive will be diminished because there will be the possibility of obtaining a tenancy at a market rent. Putting aside the impressive speech of the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), it is important to consider whether the proposed amendments will actually introduce the kind of safeguards that Opposition Members want, make the law work better, and ensure the successful conviction of people who are difficult to convict at present.

In an area where the abuses are so horrible, it is difficult to look coolly at the law and I understand the passion felt by Opposition Members in that respect. However, it is an old saying that hard cases make bad law and so we must coolly consider whether we are making changes which will work. There is a strong case for saying that we have done so.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) laid about him and said that a whole range of people, from The Guardian to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, did not understand anything about this subject. That is unfair, and it may be that they understand our proposals more clearly than the hon. Gentleman. The difference between the proposals of Opposition Members and our own is not quite so great as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West believes.

The starting point for all of this is the definitions in the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, which refer to

"acts calculated to interfere with the peace or comfort" and so on, which are the words we have adopted for the Bill. The withdrawal of services, which is a technique to which one hon. Member referred, is specifically mentioned in all three provisions. It is clear to my advisers that courses of actions are included within the meaning of the word "acts" in this context, and could make the person guilty of harassment open to prosecution—there is no question about that.

Clauses 25 and 27 of the Bill use the words

"acts calculated to interfere with", which clearly includes a course of conduct; the legal advice on that point is perfectly clear.

Turning to amendment No. 199, is it right that a landlord could be liable to damages—which, rightly, could be very large if he were properly convicted—if he did not intend to evict the tenant, did not know that his tenant would leave, and had no reasonable cause to believe that such would happen? Imagine the absurdity of a case where the prosecution could succeed, which would produce injustice the other way. We are no less keen to ensure convictions, but if we produce a law so draconian that it falls into disrepute and must be amended the other way, we shall not have done anything very sensible.

We began by committing ourselves to the scope of clause 25 and the capacity to secure convictions. The concept of intent was put to us but—and we sympathised with this—intent was too difficult to prove. Our amendments in clause 27 to the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 widen the scope to cover acts which the landlord knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, might cause a tenant to leave his home. Those could be just the courses of action and types of conduct to which Opposition Members have referred. That is why, by amendment 295, we are widening the scope of clause 25. I had hoped that Opposition Members would support that amendment because I am advised that it would help considerably to make convictions achievable.

Amendment No. 297 provides an additional defence for a landlord who can be sued for damages under the clause. Although it is unpopular to say so, occasionally the tenant harasses the landlord. Unlike the cases quoted tonight, I have had one or two in my constituency the other way round. We must not inadvertently cause injustice the other way. A landlord may withdraw services for reasons which are outside his control or which are not his fault. We should allow him to have a defence which the clause, as it stands, does not provide.

The changes which we have made will be shown to be important when cases are brought. Under the existing rents legislation we have had the very conditions which have caused some of the appalling cases that Opposition Members have rightly described. Some of the names that have been mentioned are famous. It has been depressing that we have not had enough convictions in the courts to drive those people out of business.

All the advice I have received strengthens my belief that the additional changes we are making will be beneficial. Let us not forget that in the first place we put a huge new power in the Bill—the right for a person to get damages if he can show that he has been evicted. That is an addition to the armoury. The changes will enable major steps to be taken to rid the country of some of the practices about which Opposition Members have rightly complained. I commend the Government amendments to the House.

Mr. Tony Banks: On behalf of the Opposition, I accept the good intentions of the Minister. We did that throughout the Committee stage, but I am afraid that good intentions are not enough. The Minister perhaps does not understand. Perhaps the sort of things that are going on are beyond his experience. The actions committed by landlords that are not caught by the Bill amount to harassment by another name. Far from being the odd dramatic example, the cases that we have quoted are symptomatic of conduct in many parts of the country, particularly in the decaying inner cities and in places where houses are in multiple occupation.

The Minister must understand that we are not trying to take an entrenched position. We are not saying that all landlords must by definition be in the wrong. The Minister knows that we are not comparing equal parties. The average landlord is in an immensely more powerful position than the average tenant. Therefore, the ability of the landlord to harass is inevitably far greater than that of the tenant to make trouble for the landlord. No doubt we could all point to one or two isolated examples of the latter, but we will come to them later.

Once again, good intentions do not necessarily make good legislation unless they are turned into cast-iron guarantees and assurances within the Bill. On this part of the Bill the assurances have not turned into guarantees. Therefore, we will press the amendment to a Division.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

THE MEASURE OF DAMAGES

Amendments made: No. 266, in page 18, line 11, leave out 'landlord's interest' and insert

'interest of the landlord in default'.

No. 267, in page 18, line 14, leave out 'the landlord's' and insert 'that'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Mr. Waldegrave: I beg to move amendment No. 268, in page 18, line 17, leave out 'subsection (1) above' and insert 'this section'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 270, 272 and 274.

Mr. Waldegrave: Clause 26 sets out the basis on which the court is to assess damages when a landlord is found unlawfully to have evicted a tenant under clause 25.

As the clause stands, the court has to disregard any value that can be attributed to the potential development of the building. The matter was discussed in Committee, but it has also been discussed outside Parliament. The amendments are designed to allow development value to be taken into account in certain cases. They will increase the compensation that is available.

A common reason why landlords want to evict tenants from houses in multiple occupation is to convert the buildings into flats for sale. There may be large profits to be made, and the amendments should catch that sort of case. They allow any value resulting from works to the building that is within the general development order to be taken into account, as well as any value from changing the use of the building by increasing or reducing the number of residential units in it. I hope that hon. Members will accept that this is further evidence of the Government's determination to ensure that potentially very wicked behaviour does not pay. Although some people have wanted us to go further, some of the pressure groups involved, such as Shelter, have acknowledged that the amendments will be a great help.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 269, in page 18,, line 18 leave out 'landlord's interest' and insert

'interest of the landlord in default'.

No. 270, in page 18, line 20, at end add 'together with its curtilage.'.

No. 271, in page 18, line 23, leave out

'is selling his interest in the building in question'

and insert

'in default is selling his interest'.

No. 272, in page 18, line 27, leave out from first 'any' to end of line 29 and insert

'substantial development of any of the land in which the landlord's interest subsists or to demolish the whole or part of any building on that land.'.

No. 273, in page 18, line 30, leave out

'Subsection (8) of section 25 above'

and insert

'In this section "the landlord in default" has the same meaning as in section 25 above and subsection (8) of that section'.

No. 274, in page 18, leave out lines 34 and 35 and insert—

'(6) The reference in subsection (3)(c) above to substantial development of any of the land in which the landlord's interest subsists is a reference to any development other than—

(a) development for which planning permission is granted by a general development order for the time being in force and which is carried out so as to comply with any condition or limitation subject to which planning permission is so granted; or

(b) a change of use resulting in the building referred to in subsection (2) above or any part of it being used as, or as part of, one or more dwelling-houses; and in this subsection "general development order" has the same meaning as in section 43(3) of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and other expressions have the same meaning as in that Act.'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

FURTHER OFFENCE OF HARASSMENT

The following amendment stood upon the Paper Amendment: No. 202, in page 18, line 39 leave out

The landlord for residential occupier or an agent of the landlord'" and insert 'Any person'.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the Government amendment we seek to strengthen the armoury that we have in place to deal with such problems.

It being Ten o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Housing Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Housing Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee) again considered.

Mr. Waldegrave: As I was saying, the amendment is an additional weapon in our armoury against bad landlords.

We acknowledge that the number of successful prosecutions under existing crimimal law has been comparatively small. There have been difficulties in getting convictions, and that is why in clause 27 we have introduced a new criminal offence, which involves having to prove not that the landlord intended to evict the tenant but merely that he knew that his actions would cause the tenant to leave or had reasonable cause to believe that they would do so. Government No. 292 extends the new criminal offence to actions by a superior landlord or his agent. It parallels our amendments to clauses 25 and 26 and the Opposition will welcome it.

The Opposition's amendment, amendment No. 202, is too wide because it applies the new offence to any person. We discussed the matter in Committee and we believe that there is a real risk that if we extend clause 27 as the amendment suggests, third parties whose behaviour is alleged by someone else to be anti-social, but which should certainly not be criminal, may be affected. One can imagine these powerful criminal sanctions applying in the difficult disputes between neighbours that we all hear of in our constituencies from time to time. While such disputes are a problem, they should not be dealt with by the criminal law, especially if it carries heavy sanctions such as two years in gaol.

While I understand what lies behind the Opposition's proposals, I fear that if we accepted their amendment we should find disputes between tenants becoming involved with the criminal law in a way that would not be satisfactory. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will acknowledge that our widening of the provision is useful and that to go further would not necessarily be safe.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thought that I would be called first, Mr. Speaker, because amendment No. 202 is our amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I think that it was my mistake; I should have called the hon. Gentleman first. I remind the House that we are also considering Government amendment No. 292.

Mr. Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 202. I am a sort of stand-in Whip for the evening. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I was the Whip on the Bill; some litte problems arose but I am now back in a sort of temporary agency capacity. I realise that the hour is fairly late but these are serious matters which we should address. Ministers and hon. Members should not underestimate the seriousness with which we treat the Bill.

Amendment No. 202 relates to clause 27, which creates a new criminal offence of harassment, which applies if the landlord or his agent performs a positive act that interferes with the peace and comfort of the occupier or withholds services that he or she needs and if the landlord knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that his conduct is likely to cause the occupier to leave. The novelty of the clause is that it does away with the need for the prosecution to prove intent.

After 10 years' experience of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, tenants and their advisers are agreed that the most difficult element of that Act which renders it, in most cases, useless is the need for the prosecution to prove that the landlord intended, by his acts, that the tenant should leave. Our amendment contains a much more sensible approach. When the landlord has reasonable cause to believe that the likely consequence of his action will be that the tenant will leave, he will be guilty of an offence.

In clause 27 there is a strange departure from the form of words used in the Protection from Eviction Act 1977. Instead of the wording in section 1 which states:

"Any person . . . shall be guilty of the offence.", the Bill requires the offence to be committed by the landlord or his agent. That is an unnecessary restriction and we cannot accept that our amendment is an unnecessary extension. When we are trying to deal with the rights of tenants, surely the benefit of doubt should always be given to the tenant. Therefore, we hope that the Minister will accept the amendment.

[Mr. Banks]

I shall give a quick example from the London borough of Newham.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am a little confused about the amendment to which the hon. Gentleman is speaking. Has he accepted my arguments on amendment No. 202? He seems to be speaking to amendment No. 203.

Mr. Banks: I am speaking to amendment No. 202.

I shall give an example from Newham, as ever. A house in multiple occuption in the Barking road was being investigated by the local housing office because the tenants were being charged excessive rents. There were five tenants in the house. The local housing office managed to contact four of them. The two joint tenants on the ground floor had their rent collected by a man called David. They had seen another man with him who they believed to be the owner. The sole tenant on the rear ground floor had seen a man he believed to be the owner, Mr. B. The rent was collected by his agent. The tenant did not know his name. The tenant in the first floor rear room knew that the agent was called David but he had never seen the owner. The tenant on the third floor was let the room by Mr. B who called round to the property with his brother David. As the Minister will appreciate, it was all very confusing.

Investigations carried out at the Land Registry under section 129 of the Land Registration Act 1925 were unhelpful. The register gave the name of the owner as a third unknown person and his address as that of the property itself. When the tenants sought to register their rents they started to have problems. They had no evidence that linked the people they knew with the unknown owner.

Tenants do not have the resources to investigate "agency" arrangements and the Minister must know that. If it is possible to prosecute directly the person who committed the acts of harassment, the evil may be stopped. It seems right that people who persecute tenants should be held responsible for those acts, even if they carry them out because they are paid by the landlord. Therefore, I ask the Minister to accept amendment No. 202.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am sorry that I misunderstood the early part of the hon. Gentleman's comments.

There is a problem. Let us use the common example of noise in which people are constantly making life a misery by playing loud music or making other noise. As amendment No. 202 is drafted, it would not have to be demonstrated that the person making the noise was acting on behalf of the landlord. If there were disputes between neighbours in a building, we would find that the weight of the criminal prosecution, which we are aiming at people acting as agents for the landlord, could be used on a tenant who was harassing another tenant.

I do not want to say that one tenant harassing another in a personal dispute is not a bad thing. However, there are other ways of trying to deal with that. In my constituency I find that disputes between neighbours are some of the most difficult disputes in which to become involved. But surely we do not want to hit one side of such a dispute with powers designed to deal with a landlord who is using harassment to get the tenant out and obtain possession of his property.

I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's case but the amendment is too wide. We have to be able to demonstrate that the person is acting on behalf of the landlord. Amendment No. 202, as drafted, does not do that.

Amendment negatived.

FURTHER OFFENCE OF HARASSMENT

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 203, in page 18, line 41, leave out 'does acts calculated' and insert 'commits any act or omits to act or pursues any course of conduct, which act, omission, or course of conduct is likely.'

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 204, in page 19, line 5, leave out

'he knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that'.

No. 205, in page 19, leave out lines 10 to 14, and insert —

'(3B) It shall be a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (3A) above—

(a) to prove that the act, omission or course of conduct was the only means by which in all the circumstances he could have secured the health, safety and welfare of the residential occupier, or that of the residential occupier of adjacent premises, whilst making the least possible infringement of any part of this section in respect the residential occupier; or

(b) to show that the act, omission or course of conduct occurred wholly accidentally'.

Mr. Banks: The amendments create a criminal offence of harassment where the landlord knew or had reasonable cause to believe that his actions would lead to the tenant leaving. The amendments are similar to ones that we tabled to clause 25, which creates a new civil claim for damages, so I do not intend to linger on the arguments.

We are now discussing the criminal law, so the prosecution must prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt. We therefore have that safeguard against frivolous prosecutions of trivial matters. We must ensure that we give adequate safeguards to vulnerable tenants against bad landlords.

The Bill is generous to landlords in the extreme. For new lettings, they can charge market rents, and if they let on shorthold agreements they can recover possession any time after the end of the initial period of the tenancy, which can be as little as six months. If landlords abuse the legal procedures whereby they can recover possession of their property with comparative ease, which is what the Bill is about, there can be no excuse for them. Only an irresponsible landlord would ignore the new powers that give him such a free hand in court and choose instead to inhabit the twilight land of winkling tenants out, which we believe will happen under the Bill. One must ask why they feel unable to entertain the scrutiny of the courts in their actions for possession. For example, are they avoiding tax or are they involved in mortgage fraud? There can only be a shady and unpleasant reason why they would not use the legal powers that they have been given with such a generous hand by the Government.

I ask the Minister to give something, however small, to tenants who at present are protected but who inevitably will become the targets of unscrupulous landlords seeking to get them out to let the property on new decontrolled rents, and to the new assured and shorthold tenants, who will have so few rights.

In the amendments we are asking for the bare minimum. Amendment No. 203 asks not only that positive acts should amount to criminal offences but the other methods of harassment that are employed by landlords in my constituency and others. Hon. Members have given such examples, and the Minister openly accepted that they happen because he knew that we had not made them up. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) gave a litany based on his experiences of the east end and the devices that unscrupulous landlords use.

Amendment No. 204 asks the court to deduce that the likely consequences of the landlord's actions would be that the tenant would have to leave. The court would be able to examine the proximity of the events to the result and decide whether there is a causal link between them. I do not think that, as the Under-Secretary said in Committee, we shall have hundreds of poor innocent landlords in the dock as a result of that change. Proper evidence would still have to be presented to the court and the magistrate would have to decide whether the case was proven beyond all reasonable doubt. Evidently, for once, Labour Members have more faith in the court system than the Minister and the Government.

Amendment No. 205 tries to define the reasonable defences that a landlord may raise. We do not wish to penalise a landlord who is making proper arrangements to do repairs. It would be nonsense to do so and we made that clear in Committee and now on Report. I regret that that is the easiest way to harass a tenant but not be caught.

I should be interested to hear what other reasonable courses of conduct the Government suggest a landlord might take and risk committing the offence of harassment. Our amendment reasonably lists the appropriate defences that a landlord might use. It gives a clear signal to landlords that conduct that interferes with the peace and comfort of tenants is not acceptable to Labour Members or, I hope, to the Government.

Mr. Winnick: It is always a pleasure to intervene after a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and I know that he always appreciates my interventions—or so he tells me.

10.15 pm

There has been a great deal of publicity and we have already heard in the debate about the Minister's wish to protect tenants and about the legal steps in the Bill. If the Minister is really determind to stamp out the type of Rachmanism about which my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West has just spoken, our amendments would be accepted. I know the views of the Secretary of State and that the amendments are not acceptable to the Government. Perhaps I am wrong but I suspect that the Minister's boss rather than the Minister has vetoed the amendments. The Minister is considered to be something of a wet in such matters and perhaps he would have recognised our genuine concern and accepted that what we are asking for is modest.

I should like to repeat the point that I made earlier. These amendments are necessary for the protection of tenants who will become assured tenants and even more necessary for people who will become shorthold tenants. One of our worries, understandable in view of what occurred under the Tory's 1957 Act, is the present position of regulated tenants. The Minister has dismissed my anxiety and has said that some abuse is occurring now. We recognise that, but tenants who remain regulated when the Bill becomes law will contine to have their rents regulated and they will not be market rents.

Many such tenants, especially in places such as London, will be at great risk from their landlords. That is because the landlords will know that their tenants can be forced out legally and that the houses can be rented out again at market rents. The lettings would automatically be on market rents and on assured tenancies or, more than likely, on shorthold tenancies. That is all the more reason why tenants who will continue to have protection and who have every right to remain in their accommodation should be protected in law. The entire answer to giving such protection would be to leave the situation as it is.

There is no doubt that the Bill will become law. An amendment that will protect the interests of regulated tenants and enable them to remain in their accommodation within the law is certainly welcome. Such an amendment would prevent tenants from ending up in squalid accommodation or in bed-and-breakfast hostels.

Mr. Waldegrave: I strongly disagree with the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) that the best thing to do and the solution to all the problems is to leave things as they are. As some of his hon. Friends have eloquently explained, the present situation is far from satisfactory.

We looked again at this after a similar discussion in Committee. The amendment proposes an incredibly wide automatic use of the criminal law. A landlord who does not repair a dwelling and thereby causes the tenant to leave would not have to know that the tenant intended to leave. He would find himself committing an offence even if he did not know the outcome of his actions. Amendment No. 205 provides a defence, but it is very narrow and one must remember that we cannot introduce the full panoply of the criminal law without very great care.

It would be quite wrong to introduce a criminal offence that could be proved almost automatically by the omission of something. In many cases the landlord would not have had any intention of committing an offence nor any knowledge of the tenant's reaction. It is not enough just to say that, if he proves that it was accidental, he has a defence. He has to know what would be in the tenant's mind. If he guesses wrong, he finds himself in gaol for a criminal offence. I think that this is too wide.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is not as if the tenant will go to court, and the landlord will automatically be locked up or penalised, simply because the tenant attends. The Minister makes it sound as though it would be a matter of straightforward procedure and that the tenant will prove the point in that way. The whole idea of this going through the courts is that one has to prove a case beyond reasonable doubt. We have some faith in the courts and, therefore, if the case being mounted by the tenant does not stand up, of course the magistrate will not find in favour of the tenant. I do not think it is automatic.

Mr. Waldegrave: With respect, the hon. Gentleman is defining a possible criminal act which in the words of his own amendment would be committed if the person

"acts or omits to act or pursues any course of conduct, which act, omission, or course of conduct is likely" to have the effect of making the tenant leave.

I agree that the conviction is not automatic, but the commission of the offence is, which is what we must be concerned about in the House. It is then up to the police to catch the criminal. The landlord would automatically have committed a criminal offence without having any intention of damaging the tenant. It really is too wide.

There are problems here about not getting the repairs done. I argue that that is not an issue where we should use the criminal law. Rather, we should strengthen, as we are strengthening elsewhere, the capacity of local authorities to make stiffer repair orders and so forth that can be properly designed to deal with that problem.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 292, in page 19, line 22, at end insert

'and any superior landlord under whom that person derives title'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

VARIATION OF SCOPE OF 1977 SS.3 AND 4

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 206, in page 19, leave out lines 23 to 26.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 207, in page 19, line 27, leave out 'that section' and insert

'section 3 of the 1977 Act (prohibition of eviction without due process of law)'

No. 208, in page 19, line 30, leave out the words 'other than an excluded licence,'.

No. 209, in page 19, leave out lines 35 to 43.

No. 210, in page 20, line 4, leave out '(other than an excluded licence)'.

No. 211, in page 20, line 9, leave out clause 29.

Government amendment No. 40.

No. 230, in clause 29, page 20, line 17, leave out 'or a member of the owner's family (whether or not in common with other persons.'.

No. 234, in page 20, line 21, leave out 'also at the time it comes to an end' and insert 'at all times since then'.

Government amendment No. 41.

No. 231, in page 20, line 22, leave out 'or a member of his family'.

Government amendments Nos. 42 to 47.

Mr. Banks: These amendments relate to clauses 28 and 29 which change the Rent Act 1977. We have accepted that clauses 25, 26 and 27 and the amendments that the Government have moved tighten the law—but, as we have said, not as much as we would like—against illegal eviction. It seems a depressingly inevitable consequence that the Government could not give something to tenants without, of course, wanting to take something from them at the same time. In clauses 28 and 29, they take the most basic protection from certain tenants and licensees: the right to proper notice and an order from the court when evicting tenants and licensees in certain circumstances.

Those circumstances are, first, if the tenant is sharing certain living accommodation with the landlord or a member of the landlord's family at the beginning and ending of the tenancy; secondly, if the tenancy or licence was granted as a temporary expedient to a person who entered the accommodation as a squatter; thirdly, holiday lets; fourthly, hostels provided by statutory or voluntary bodies; and, fifthly, anyone else whom the Secretary of State names.

We believe that this seriously undermines the protection from arbitrary eviction that tenants are entitled to expect. We are not asking that the landlord should not be able to obtain possession of his property in certain circumstances, only that there should be proper scrutiny of the facts when possession is sought. For example, are the Government really saying that people living in hostels, possibly having been discharged from institutions dealing with drink or drug dependency problems, should be evicted on to the streets without any protection whatsoever from the courts? If the Government's response is to say that they do not expect hostels to evict residents in such a way, what is the point in giving them the power to do so? One does not give powers to certain institutions and agencies without expecting them to use them at some time in the future.

I turn now to the vexed question of holiday lets. I have often thought, Mr. Speaker, about what you could get for a holiday let of your premises when you go away. You are not even listening, Mr. Speaker—[Interruption.] Ah, yes, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that holiday lets are the largest category of sham lettings. As we all know, genuine holiday lets do not create security of tenure, but removing the need for a court order makes shams even more attractive to landlords wishing to abuse the system because the court hearing is usually the only point at which the sham can be tested.

I give the Minister of State a good example. Nurses working at the Royal Free hospital in Hampstead were let rooms on holiday let agreements in the street opposite the hospital. At the end of the six months of the let, it was extended by a further six months. After taking advice, the nurses applied for fair rents to be registered on the premises. The landlord then applied to the courts for possession, but the court upheld the nurses' claim that it was a sham and that they had a protected tenancy. That was because they had the ability to go to court and that is why we feel that it is wrong that that ability should be taken away.

Resident landlords of houses in multiple occupation regularly keep a room locked and vacant for, they say, their own use which, if the clauses remain unchanged, will make bogus residency claims harder to disprove as evictions will take place without any court hearings. Obviously, resident landlords who no longer have a reasonable relationship with their tenants will want to obtain possession, but as the tenants do not have full security a possession order could be reasonably and easily obtained. However, in our experience it is more often the landlord who makes petty rules and regulations and generally makes life unpleasant for the tenant rather than the other way round.

I give the Minister another brief example. A student renting a room from a resident landlord in Canterbury was told that she could not have friends to visit or jointly study, that she should not come in after 10 pm or use the bathroom after 9 pm and that she had to vacate the room at weekends if the landlord had any family coming to stay. She was constantly made aware by the landlord that any infringement of those rules or any other disagreement with him would lead to eviction. She was therefore in a state of agitation up to and during her final exams.

The forms of tenure being removed from the law would not be the first choice for those with any real choice in the decisions about their housing. However, such tenures will be the only option for people who, because of age, disability, income or ethnic origin, have no real choice about the accommodation that they occupy. The Minister must know that that is often the case. Such people should not be further penalised by the removal of the vestige of protection that they have at the moment.

The Government are already allowing landlords easier access to courts for possession proceedings, and required notice periods have been reduced. Our amendments do not seek full security for such tenures. We seek only to ensure that the courts are still involved before evictions take place. Excluded tenures would be an incentive to create shams, which are notoriously difficult to prove once the tenant has been evicted. Where possession proceedings are not being brought, the tenant has no easy access to the court to show that a sham is in operation. Tenants would have to predict their landlords' actions and go to court for declarations of protected tenancies, leaving themselves open to harassment and early eviction. Alternatively, they would have to fight their case after they had been evicted, when not only would the facts be difficult to prove, but legal aid would be difficult to obtain.

I am sure that, on reflection, the Minister will accept that it is unreasonable to remove what minimal protection already exists in such specific examples and I am sure that he will now be willing to accept our amendments.

Mr. Waldegrave: As a result of the discussions in Committee we believed that one matter needed amendment. I hope that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will welcome that fact, although I do not accept some of his other points. The hon. Gentleman will remember that we undertook in Committee—I know that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will remember this—to have another look at the situation where the resident landlord is said to be sharing and the tenant is excluded because he is sharing with a member of the resident landlord's family. That seemed to us to be quite an easy form of abuse. A resident landlord could scatter members of his family round and about. We have dealt with that in amendments Nos. 40 to 47.

Although hon. Members on both sides of the House will approve of the provisions of clause 28 in general, and the strengthening of the Protection from Eviction Act which they represent, we must be careful that as we extend the Bill to cover licences by making the position of licensees far stronger, which we are doing, we do not produce any problems or difficulties. It is inevitable that, if we are to strengthen the position of licensees in general, we have to consider one or two exceptions, and we have done that.

It has been put to me by a number of bodies involved that it would make the management of hostels impossible if hostel authorities had to get a court order to evict a resident who did not want to move. It might even mean that they had to get a court order to move a resident within the hostel.

10.30 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes: I know that the Minister has been approached by the National Federation of Housing Associations about hostels and licences. Does he intend to apply the same approach in the private sector as in the social sector to hostel users and the difficulties involved in such licences?

Mr. Waldegrave: We shall come to another matter regarding hostels, which I had better not quote from memory at this time of night in case I get it wrong. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have been in touch with the NFHA and have visited some of the hostels in my constituency and talked through some of the problems and tried to meet them. We shall have to make another amendment in another place fully to deal with the question, but we shall come back to it.

We want to encourage resident landlords properly to use their property and to let spare accommodation. We know that they will not do that if it means sharing with someone they cannot easily remove if relations deteriorate. We must all have heard such constituency stories; I certainly have.

Hon. Members accept that in general the resident landlord exclusion is justified and the extension of the provision to cases in which a tenant or licensee shares accommodation with a member of the landlord's or licensor's family was more difficult. We want to cover cases in which the property is sub-divided in such a way that the tenant shares with a family member—say, the landlord's mother—in one part of the house and the landlord lives in another part of the house. We have not quite achieved that and that is why we have tabled amendments.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West raised the matter of holiday lets. There has been a problem with holiday lets. We strongly argue the converse of the arguments that were put to us by the Opposition. Shorthold and market rents will make the incentive for sham holiday lets disappear, and that abuse will go of its own accord when the Bill is passed. It would be monstrous for someone making a genuine holiday letting to have to get a court order to evict a holidaymaker who outstayed his let. In many parts of the country where holiday letting is a key part of the rural economy that would produce very severe problems.

Mr. Tony Banks: Has the Minister any evidence, any hard statistics, about genuine holiday lets which do not create any security of tenancy ending up with the landlord having to go to court to get the tenant out? Do any statistics show such abuse?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall check and find out whether there are, but obviously it would be wrong to do anything that would encourage such abuse. More important, the case that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West described would have been answered by shorthold. Presumably the landlord would have let on shorthold and not needed to use the mechanism of a sham holiday-let.

I ask hon. Members to recognise that the widened provisions of the Protection from Eviction Act cannot be sensible if there are no excluded licences and I ask them to reject the Opposition amendments and to accept our amendments which meet the commitment that we made in Committee.

Mr. Tony Banks: We are bitterly disappointed at the Minister's failure to accept a reasonable set of amendments, but on this occasion we shall not press the amendment to a vote.

Amendment negatived.

No. 42, in page 20, line 24, leave out from 'the' to 'formed' in line 25 and insert 'shared accommodation'.

No. 43, in page 20, line 25, at end add—

'(2A) A tenancy or licence is also excluded if—

(a) under its terms the occupier shares any accommodation with a member of the family of the landlord or licensor:

(b) immediately before the tenancy or licence was granted and also at the time it comes to an end, the member of the family of the landlord or licensor occupied as his only or principal home premises of which the whole or part of the shared accommodation formed part; and

(c) immediately before the tenancy or licence was granted and also at the time it comes to an end, the landlord or licensor occupied as his only or principal home premises in the same building as the shared accommodation and that building is not a purpose-built block of flats.

(2B) For the purposes of subsections (2) and (2A) above, an occupier shares accommodation with another person if he has the use of it in common with that person (whether or not also in common with others) and any reference in those subsections to shared accommodation shall be construed accordingly, and if, in relation to any tenancy or licence, there is at any time more than one person who is the landlord or licensor, any reference in those subsections to the landlord or licensor shall be construed as a reference to any one of those persons.'.

No. 44, in page 20, line 26, leave out 'subsection (2)' and insert 'subsections (2) to (2B)'.

No. 45, in page 20, leave out lines 30 to 34.

No. 46, in page 20, line 36, at end insert

(d) "purpose-built block of flats" has the same meaning as in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Housing Act 1988'.

No. 47, in page 20, line 39, leave out '(2)' and insert '(2A)'.—[Mr. Waldegrave.]

Clause 30

NOTICE TO QUIT ETC.

Mr. Grist: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 21, line 37, leave out 'of premises occupied' and insert 'to occupy premises'.

The new subsection (1A) which clause 30 inserts into section 5 of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 requires an owner to give four weeks' notice to terminate a periodic licence. This parallels the existing provision in section 5(1) that four weeks' notice must be given to bring a periodic tenancy to an end. This amendment brings subsection (1A) more closely into line with section 5(1) by providing that the dwelling does not have to be occupied for the notice requirement to apply.

Amendment agreed to.

Further consideration of the Bill adjourned.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be further considered tomorrow.

Railway Accident (Colwich Junction)

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

10.35 pm

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I am most grateful for this opportunity to raise on the Adjournment the subject of the Department of Transport's report on the rail accident which occurred at Colwich junction in the middle of my Mid-Staffordshire constituency on 19 September 1986.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport for kindly being in the Chamber to reply to this debate, and I say that with the utmost sincerity because he has attended most diligently to the parliamentary questions that I have tabled in the intervening period on this matter. When the Department's inspector's report was published on 31 March 1988 he took the trouble to give me a copy at the same time as it was released to the press. For that I am extremely grateful because the press regionally and locally in Staffordshire and the west midlands paid particularly close attention and interest to the outcome of the report on the crash.

For the record I shall remind the House what occurred. There was a collision on a main railway line running from Euston to Liverpool at 28 minutes past six on Friday 19 September 1986 between the Euston to Manchester express train and a Liverpool to Euston express train in the London midland region of British Rail at a place called Colwich junction. The opening paragraphs of the report state:

"the 17.00 Euston to Manchester Piccadilly express passenger train, electrically hauled and consisting of 13 vehicles"

"diverted from the Down Fast line to the Down Slow line some 800 yards from the switch diamonds forming the Junction between the Down Slow-Down Manchester line and the Up Crewe-Euston line and ran past the signal protecting the Junction at Danger, coming to a stand, or nearly so, with the locomotive straddling the switch diamonds of the Junction, 259 yards beyond the signal."

The other train was the 17.20 Liverpool to Euston express passenger train, again electrically hauled, but containing 12 carriages. The report continues:

"It was travelling under clear signals at a speed of 95-100 mile/h on the Up West Coast Main Line closely approaching Colwich Junction when, without time for the driver to apply the brakes, the locomotive of the Manchester train was seen ahead astride the junction."

The two trains collided—obviously, since they were both express trains—with tremendous force. They were derailed, all wheels, and turned over on their sides. The pictures in the national press the following day and on the 9 o'clock news that evening were quite horrendous.

At this point I would like to place on record—it has been done at other times and in other places—the gratitude of my constituents and, I know, of the families involved in the crash with whom I have been in touch to all the emergency services—the ambulance service, the nursing services, the various hospitals in the Mid-Staffordshire health authority and the police. I would like to pay a particular tribute to my constituents in the villages of Colwich, Great Haywood, Little Haywood and Rugeley who took families and others involved in the collision into their homes to provide comfort and temporary accommodation.

Out of 373 passengers on the Manchester train and 500 passengers on the Liverpool train, 75 were injured, and the driver of one of the trains was tragically killed. It was a mercy that only one person was killed.

As I understand it, my hon. Friend instructed the railway inspectorate in the Department of Transport, on 22 September, to launch an inquiry and prepare a report on the events of that evening of 19 September. That report was sent to the Department of Transport on 29 February this year and, as I have reminded the House, published on 31 March. I do not wish to dwell in detail on the report; it is a very technical and, to my inexperienced and unschooled eye—my knowledge of railways, apart from commuting regularly from Euston to Birmingham International, derives from playing with my Hornby Dublo some years ago now—most extensively and comprehensively prepared. I am quite sure that my hon. Friend, who knows much more about these matters, because of his departmental responsibilities, will agree with that. I have learnt a great deal from having read the report thoroughly, but it raises a few disturbing questions regarding the conduct of certain aspects of British Rail's relationship with some of its employees, and other matters, and I felt it right to bring these to the attention of the House and to seek an assurance from my hon. Friend that some lessons will be learnt from this tragedy.

First, I cannot understand why it should have taken 18 months to prepare a report. I have said that it is a report of considerable comprehensiveness and thoroughness, but 18 months strikes me as a very long time, and I will explain why the delay has caused anguish to a number of people closely connected with the collision in a moment. I think it is a long time because, on the first Friday of March of last year, some six months after the Colwich crash, there was an even more horrendous collision—that of the Herald of Free Enterprise in Zeebrugge. The report in that respect, also commissioned by my hon. Friend's Department, was published on 24 July of last year, just four months after the collision. I find it difficult, therefore, to understand why the Colwich junction crash report took 18 months.

When a representative of the regional press, having read on the Order Paper that this Adjournment debate was to be held, made contact with British Rail, I understand that he was told that 18 months was par for the course. Those are the words that have been reported to me. If that is true, I find it a disturbing element of apathy, and I hope that my hon. Friend, if such a collision occurred again and he was in a position to instruct his inspectorate, would ensure that it prepared its report rather more swiftly. I say that because the report entirely exonerates from blame the driver of one of the express trains. I refer to Driver Eric Goode, who, as I have said, tragically died in the crash. He was a constituent not of mine but of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). She hoped to be present to make a brief intervention this evening, but I have received a note from the Message Board indicating that she has been detained at Heathrow on her way back from a conference in Rome.

I had the privilege of meeting Driver Goode's widow at a memorial service which the BBC's religious affairs department staged in Colwich church three months after the tragedy. She has kept in touch with me ever since. I believe it to be true that very little contact was made by British Rail—and I have raised this point with my hon. Friend in the past—during the passage of the inquiry. If my information is correct, Driver Goode's widow has still not received a copy of the inspector's report.

Because of the publicity attracted by my campaign to persuade the authorities to speed up the inspector's report, by way of tabling written questions in the intervening period, the family of the signalman most directly involved at the particular point in the railway line concerned was also under considerable pressure between the time of the crash and the publication of the inspector's report. The report makes reference to him. He lives in the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). That signalman, as with Driver Goode, is totally exonerated from any blame or responsibility for what occurred. However, the clouds of suspicion and guilt which hung over those two families during the period of the report's production must have been unbearable and intolerable. Anything that can be done to expedite inquiries of that nature, as happened in the case of the Zeebrugge disaster, must be to the benefit of those most directly involved.

I turn to the inspector's conclusions. First, the blame for the collision was placed, sadly and tragically, but fairly and squarely, on the shoulders of the driver of the other express train. One can, from a close inspection of the report, glean the information that he broke a number of rules, including having in his cabin a British Rail employee who should not have been allowed there.

I am concerned to be assured that the driver—and I shall not mention his name because that would be inappropriate—if he is still employed by British Rail, should not be driving express trains. I draw a comparison with someone who causes an accident on the M1 or M6, and who may as a result be convicted of driving carelessly, dangerously or recklessly, and banned from driving for a time or even for life. In a case of this nature, where there was clearly a breach of rules—and dare I suggest that there may have been an element of negligence—the public has a right to know whether the person responsible is still entrusted with driving trains, be they goods trains, suburban trains or express trains.

The recommendation of the inspector at paragraph 83 was:

"The reduction in the number of motive power inspectors, as part of the general 'slimming' down of the railway staff, is, in my opinion, a retrograde step which can only lead to less efficient supervision on vital safety matters."

I am not sufficiently technically qualified—indeed, I am not technically qualified at all—to know what a motive power inspector is, but clearly he is of considerable importance in ensuring the safety of the rolling stock. If there has been a general slimming down of such personnel, that must have a bearing on the safety of our rolling stock. I invite my hon. Friend, when he replies, to tell me the present position.

I also wish to draw the attention of the House to paragraph 84 of the inspector's recommendations, which is very disturbing:

"In addition, this accident emphasises the importance of the continual updating of the British Railways Rule Book, together with associated safety documents. I find the fact that Section C Clause 3.1.1. was not amended or expanded from its original issue dealing with Yellow Flashing Aspects on the approaches to diverging junctions in 1977 until after and resulting from this accident in 1986 most disturbing".

To me that means that British Rail's rule book had not been updated for 11 years until these recommendations were published. I hesitate to think what the position might be today if the Colwich crash had not occurred. I wonder when British Rail would have got round to updating the rule book—presumably every engine driver's working manual. I ask my hon. Friend to obtain assurances, if possible, (a) that the rule book has been updated, and (b) that express train drivers familiarise themselves with it at regular intervals.

The final point which attracts my attention, and one which disturbs me greatly, is contained in paragraph 86:

"A considerable part of this Report has dealt with the braking of train 1H20 immediately prior to the collision. Despite invoking the braking experts of the Director of Mechanical and Electrical Engineering and the Director of Research, also carrying out two sets of speed and braking tests using the coaches actually involved in the collision, or where that was not possible, similar coaches, I am still not completely convinced that the braking after the emergency brake application by"— the driver who was subsequently found to be guilty—

"was as effective as one would have expected. Considerable attention has been paid to the effect of the operation of wheel slide prevention equipment on MkIII coaches and, while I accept that the Lucas Girling equipment, as fitted to the coaches on train 1H20, has not been found to suffer from spurious cyclic activity, I accept the evidence of Senior Technician Morgan that he heard considerable wheel slide prevention activity as the MkIII coaches passed Colwich Signal Box."

The fact that the inspector was not completely convinced that the braking after the emergency brake application by the driver was as effective as it might have been leads me to suggest to my hon. Friend that members of the travelling public have a right to be assured that all possible attention is paid to these braking systems, however sophisticated they may be, to ensure that if such a crash ever occurred again it would not draw the sort of adverse comment that I have just quoted.

I raise these points and invite my hon. Friend's comments simply to ensure that we as Members of Parliament can scrutinise as far as possible the activities and the management of British Rail and other nationalised bodies. If I had written to the chairman of British Rail or to the person specifically responsible for the inquiry, I would probably not have got as full, frank and direct a reply as I shall get from my hon. Friend the Minister. I am most grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. David Mitchell): My hon. Friend will be aware that the functions of the railway inspectorate of the Department of Transport involve the inspection and approval of new railway works and the investigation of railway accidents.

Of course, principal responsibility for railway safety rests with the railway operators themselves. The British Railways Board has a duty under section 3(1) of the Transport Act 1962 to have due regard to efficiency, economy and safety of operation, and it is always conscious of that.

My hon. Friend will also know that the inquiry into the Colwich collision was held under section 7 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871. Any recommendations made by the inspector in his report are not statutorily binding, and thus British Rail is not forced to adopt them. It is an accepted practice, however, that the British Railways Board gives due consideration to the report as a whole, and to the recommendations in particular. The member of the board responsible for safety, David Rayner, will reply to the Secretary of State in due course —it normally takes two or three months—commenting on the report and the action that the board proposes to take on the recommendations. I say that because my hon. Friend may find the context helpful.

My hon. Friend has referred to the cause of the accident. I confirm that the immediate cause of the collision was that the driver of the Euston-Manchester train passed the signal protecting Colwich junction at danger and, despite making an emergency application of the brakes shortly before reaching the signal, failed to bring the train to a halt until the locomotive was on the actual junction.

The reason for the driver passing the signal at danger was his ignorance of the meaning of the flashing yellow aspects and the associated signals approaching Colwich junction. It was the first time he had driven over the route since the signalling had been altered and flashing yellow aspects introduced on the approach to the cross-over from the down fast to the down slow line on the approach to the junction. The driver had received and signed for two weekly notices the month before the accident which gave details of the signalling alterations, but he had not read them. Had he studied them, there is little doubt that he would not have mistaken the meaning of the signals and would have braked so that he came to a halt before the signal protecting the junction.

I shall deal separately with braking, a possible contributory cause to the accident.

I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the emergency services on the efficiency with which they evacuated those involved. In particular, I praise the exemplary action of Signalman Millward, who was on duty in the Colwich signal box. He was completely unable to prevent the accident, but, immediately it occurred, he took all the necessary steps to stop all approaching trains and alert the emergency services. I understand that he subsequently found it a strain to work in that signal box and that he has been moved to another signal box in the area where he is more settled.

As my inspector has stated, the death of Driver Goode, the driver of the Liverpool-Euston train, was particularly tragic, as he had no chance to protect himself. I am sorry also to learn that his widow has recently died. Although it was in no way his duty, throughout his inquiry, my inspector kept in touch with Mrs. Goode and her son Stewart, the latter expressing gratitude on behalf of his mother for the sympathetic attitude shown to the family. I am also assured that the regional operations manager of London midland region personally visited Mrs. Goode after the accident and ensured that the welfare department was providing all the necessary help. I hope that my hon. Friend will be glad to receive that assurance.

My hon. Friend mentioned the delay in publishing the report. He questioned the 18-month time scale and asked whether it was par for the course. The answer is no. The normal time scale is about half that. My hon. Friend has asked me several questions about that matter.

I should explain that the delay in completing the report was due to the extensive technical investigations that had to be carried out. The responsibility for delaying the publication of the report until the technical investigation had been completed lies with the inspector who held the inquiry. I believe that he acted correctly in trying to determine by all means possible why the brakes appeared not to operate as efficiently as usual when the driver made an emergency brake application. These investigations included carrying out a number of speed-brake tests with trains as similar as possible to the Euston-Manchester express involved in the accident. When those tests proved inconclusive, he arranged for a special working party of the directorate of mechanical and electrical engineering and the research directorate, British Railways Board, to carry out further investigations in depth into the braking of the train and the possible effect of the malfunctioning or the excessive operation of the wheel slide prevention equipment fitted to the Mark III coaches—in layman's terms, a device to prevent skidding. The inspector was closely associated with those investigations and it was only at the end of last year that he accepted that no definite results could be obtained to explain the apparent poor braking of the Manchester express. He then produced his report as rapidly as possible.

My hon. Friend raised a number of other specific points, particularly with regard to the question of the position of the driver of the train who was at fault. I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that any disciplinary action taken by British Railways concerning its staff is a matter entirely for the railway management, and it would be quite wrong for me to comment on the action taken over the driver of the Euston-Manchester train. I understand, however, that the driver, after a long period of sickness, has now been reinstated as a driver, but is now confined to shunting and other local duties.

My hon. Friend also raised the question of the motive power inspectors. I noticed that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) nodded knowingly at that point because he thought that that was a sign that the Government have been cutting corners. I shall show the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend that there is no truth in such an assertion. The report emphasises the importance of motive power inspectors who travel in the cab to check the correct handling of locomotives by drivers and their knowledge of the "road" generally, and signalling in particular.

I understand that there are difficulties in computing the number of motive power inspectors who carry out this function because some of them also instruct drivers. I now understand that the number of inspectors involved has in fact remained much the same for several years, but because the number of drivers has declined the number of inspectors in relation to the number of drivers has actually increased, and the standard of supervision has improved. I am sure that the House will be glad to have that information and correction to the inspector's report.

My hon. Friend also referred to the updating of the rule book. He drew attention to the inspector's remarks about the importance of continual updating of the British Railways rule book and his recommendation that more attention should be paid to updating rules and other relevant safety documents.

As the report states, the rule dealing with the use and meaning of signal aspects, including flashing yellow ones, was altered on 4 April 1987, clarifying the meaning of main aspects. Since then, the board has issued a complete revision of the rule book which came into effect on 4 June 1988. That too clarifies the meaning of signalling aspects, and I am sure the board will heed my inspector's recommendation and pay special attention to keeping the rules up to date.

I refer finally to braking. Somewhat against the clock I must state that, despite extensive investigations into the braking of the Euston-Manchester train, including two sets of speed and braking tests carried out with the coaches actually involved, the inspector has not been completely convinced of the reason why braking after the emergency brake application was not as effective as it was expected to be.

The full emergency application of the brakes is likely to introduce wheel slide even on dry rails, particularly if adhesion is reduced by any contaminant. That would activate the wheel slide prevention equipment where fitted. Therefore, there must be some reason to believe that it was not mechanical failure that caused the wheel slide mechanism to operate and therefore to slow the effectiveness of the emergency application of brakes. We can never know for certain, but possibly there was some matter on the surface of the track that acted as a lubricant and therefore led to skidding. The reaction of the mechanism, perfectly properly, tried to prevent that skidding from continuing. That led the inspector to recommend that, in the full emergency application of brakes, all brakes should be fully applied even if wheel slide occurs and wheel flats are made on the wheels. The inspector recommends the fitting of equipment to eliminate automatically the operation of the wheel slide prevention equipment in the event of an emergency brake application being made.

That is a somewhat technical explanation. I hope that my hon. Friend will find it helpful. I am grateful to him for raising the matter this evening and giving me the opportunity to explain to him and to the House the background to the four key matters that he raised that arise from the report.

Question put and agreed to.

Women's Health

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

9.36 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): This is, I believe, the first debate on women's health called in Government time for a long while, and I believe that it shows how far we have come on this important topic. In a moment I shall outline some of the major improvements that we have seen in the last year or so, and some aspects on which I want to take matters forward.

Women have been receiving advice on their health and welfare for a long time. Here is the columnist of Home Companion magazine of 12 November 1898, writing in answer to two correspondents:

"In your trouble, 'AM', you have my sympathy, and though I can hardly tell you how to become as thin and wan as a willow, I can at least tell you how you can reduce your form to graceful proportions. Take plenty of vigorous exercise and I advise you especially to try bicycling . . . And here comes 'Dorothy' who wants to know how she can grow stout. Laugh, and grow fat, 'Dorothy'. A good laugh promotes digestion and tends to lengthen life."

All good advice!

Modern problems have also been around for a long time. This is "Meg", writing to Woman's Weekly in June 1918—the date is significant:

"I should very much like to have your opinion on the modern woman's craze for smoking. One hears so much for and against the habit. A few years ago when I was in Paris, I asked a Frenchman if he admired a woman who smoked. He replied: 'Well, I should not like my wife to smoke, and would not allow her to.'"

The answer would not satisfy us today:

"I don't approve of men taking this kind of tone, as if their wives were small children; but at the same time, I think Meg's words are worth attention from another point of view. Tobacco is getting very short and we are told it will have to be rationed. Think of what that will mean to our soldiers and sailors. Girls, every packet of cigarettes you buy to smoke yourselves leaves a packet less for our fighting men!"

But yesterday's agony aunts had a different attitude on other subjects. Here is one letter, coyly signed "Wavelet", on the problems of cycling, in Home Chat magazine of April 1897:

"On a recent cycle ride, I was overtaken by another cyclist who told me one of my tyres was soft, and offered to blow it up for me. I accepted his offer. Since then, when we meet, he bows. Yesterday, I had a note asking me to take a ride with him on Sunday week. He appears to be a gentleman, but I don't know what to do with regard to this request."

The answer was very firm:

"Give the letter to your parents, who will no doubt so deal with it that this very impertinent young man will not take such a liberty again."

The obvious question to ask is why women's health? Why not health in general? Is it not somewhat artificial to separate out "women's health", along with "women's issues", "women's rights" and other, as Private Eye would put it, "loony feminist nonsense"? I am no feminist. When I was asked to take on responsibility for women's health in 1986 I wondered whether, apart from maternity, there were indeed any separate issues. There are two answers: we should look at women's health because it is completely different from men's health at almost every stage in our lives, and because many aspects of women's health and women's role in the health of their families have perhaps received far less attention in the past then they merited, not just from men but also from the women.

The differences start from the first day. More boy babies are born, but relatively more girls survive: we do not know why. Women outnumber men in every age group after middle age and the imbalance slowly increases throughout later life, until women form two thirds of the age group above 75. Thus, illnesses that increase with age affect far more women than men, and women account for the majority of in-patients in the National Health Service—that does not apply to acute care only. Women outnumber men in most age groups in diagnoses of mental illness in England; for every three men admitted to NHS mental illness hospitals and units in 1986 there were four women. Even if elderly people—75 and above—are excluded, the ratio is two men to three women. In fact, admission rates for women outnumber those for men in most of the main diagnostic groups in mental illness. The main exceptions are schizophrenia, and drug and alcohol-related mental illness—although for the latter two, women are beginning to catch up.

Women's health is different. Women tend to suffer from different ailments, and not just the obvious ones associated with reproduction. Among the preventable diseases, our main killer in this country is heart disease. It is mostly men, however, who die of heart disease. Women in middle age are on the whole far less affected than men by diseases of the cardiovascular system, unless, of course they are foolish enough to be smoking while on the pill, when their risk of a heart attack rises 10 times. In middle age, women are more likely to be victims of cancer, particularly breast cancer. It follows therefore, that health campaigns for women that may help to improve their chances of reaching a healthy and happy old age are significantly different from those for men.

Let us consider some issues of concern to women. The major killer of women before their time in the United Kingdom is breast cancer. About 250,000 women every year in the United Kingdom get a breast lump—90 per cent. are benign but 24,000 are cancer and 15,000 women die each year from this disease. That is more than seven times as many as from cervical cancer, which is probably the better known disease. The survival rate is improving. Sixty four per cent.—nearly two thirds—survive longer than five years now following first diagnosis of breast cancer, and there should be a real improvement in survival in the next decade. Although much research is under way, there is no clear causal link between breast cancer and environment or lifestyle. Therefore, apart from women with a family history of the disease, who can be warned to be especially vigilant, there is as yet no good advice we can give women on how to avoid it. That is one reason why we have developed the breast cancer screening programme. If we cannot avoid the disease—primary prevention—then the next best is to find it as early as possible and treat it while still curable—secondary prevention.

Many hon. Members will know that the NHS is setting up a national breast cancer screening service over the three years to 1990. The programme traces its origins to a working group that was set up in July 1985 on behalf of United Kingdom Health Ministers. The group was chaired by Professor Sir Patrick Forrest from Edinburgh. In February 1987, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler), announced the Government's acceptance of the proposals in the Forrest group's report.

The Forrest report concluded that screening women aged 50 to 64 by mammography every three years should eventually reduce the deaths from breast cancer by at least one third. That is several thousand women. The NHS breast cancer screening service will do what he recommended, and provide a computerised call and recall system to screen women in the age group 50 to 64 by mammography with screening for women of 65 and over if requested.

We are often asked, why not younger women? As a younger woman I assure the House that, if there was any evidence that screening would help, that would have been taken into account, but there is insufficient evidence to show that mass screening for younger women is effective in significantly reducing mortality, and more research is under way. Younger women at special risk—for example if there is a family history of breast cancer—may be offered mammography if referred by their general practitioner. Hon. Members may already know that 88 per cent. of all deaths from this cancer occur in the over-50s and its incidence in young women is far less common.

I am glad to report that the programme is making excellent progress. Each of the 14 English regional health authorities was asked to set up its first screening centre by the end of March 1988. In fact, 17 centres have now been set up—of which four will provide training for staff from the whole programme—and nearly all have now started screening. This afternoon, I shall be visiting the London training centre at King's college hospital and the first inner London screening unit at Camberwell.

By 1990, we expect to have about 100 centres nationwide, each covering a population of about half a million people. Mobile caravans will be used for screening in some areas. We hope to announce all the details about the remaining centres before the recess. The programme must be developed relatively slowly because of the need to train staff and to provide back-up facilities for diagnosis, treatment, counselling and after-care. The initial response has been excellent—in some places over 80 per cent. of the first women responded to their screening invitation. That is very encouraging.

Between 1987-88, the last financial year, and 1989-90, on current plans, nearly £55 million will have been provided to set up and run the screening centres including staff training, development of computer software, health education and counselling and support for patients. A service on the same lines is being developed in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. This will be the first nationwide comprehensive breast cancer screening service in the world. We are well ahead of all our partners in the European Community and there are no comparable programmes in nations such as the United States, which spends far more on health than we do. Our system will save many lives and we should be proud of what we are doing and aware of the massive investment which demonstrates the Government's commitment.

We have taken a similar approach to cervical cancer. It is far less common than breast cancer, with about one seventh the number of deaths per year. In 1986, 2,004 women died of cervical cancer in England and Wales. It has been linked in research to smoking and to the number of sexual partners. The significant factor, however, is that this cancer has a relatively long detectable pre-cancerous stage, during which the condition is 100 per cent. curable. Cervical cancer was one of the first cancers for which that was true. We believe that the cancer screening programme that we are implementing should save most of those 2,004 lives. All district health authorities in England have implemented computerised call and recall systems. That has been an enormous task. It has meant providing 750 visual display unit terminals; making an investment of £10 million in information technology and computerising 35 million records. The result of that may mean that we shall have a completely computerised system to assist us in all sorts of preventable screening work in future, which, of course, will also cover men.

As a result of the effort, all DHAs are now able to call women who have never been screened before, as well as recalling women who have previously had smear tests; and within five years the system will have invited all women in the age range 20 to 64 who are registered with a GP—all those we can reach, which is around 13 million women. Programmes for cervical cancer screening on similar lines are being implemented in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

A mass screening programme of a kind has existed since 1966. Its value is shown in the fact that deaths from cervical cancer have fallen by 14 per cent. in the 10 years to 1986, the year for which we have the latest figures. Without the existing system, we believe that deaths would have been much higher and could have risen. The efforts of the Government will ensure much more systematic screening and this should further increase the effectiveness of the services against cancer. Again, Britain is well ahead of the rest of the European Community on this programme and—apart from Scandinavia—is the first major country in the world to implement such a nationwide programme.

We should not underestimate the huge scale of the effort required to detect cervical cancer. Last year, about 4 million smears were done. Many of these were repeats or were done outside the screening programme. About 150,000 were abnormal, but again many were repeats. Most of the abnormal ones showed up non-cancerous infections of varying degrees of severity. Therefore, we are picking up many gynaecological conditions through this system. About 4,000 new cases of cervical cancer are reported each year, many of which do not come through the screening service at all. As I have said there are about 2,000 deaths each year, mostly among older women. It follows that the incidence of this cancer is tiny—a handful of cases in each district health authority each year.

It is important that health care professionals, especially doctors, are aware of these data so that they can reassure women with abnormal smears that the odds are that the condition is not cancer, and whatever it is, it is likely to be treatable. This programme is intended not to alarm people: but to reassure them.

There is one point to make about all our cancer screening programmes. All this money and effort will be wasted if we women do not use the systems properly. There is no need to approach one's doctor or hospital for a test unless there are symptoms. Everyone will be called in time, and we hope that everyone will respond. If there are symptoms—a breast lump, or a discharge, or anything unusual—the woman should see her doctor at once. She does not need to wait.

Incidentally, it is up to us as patients to ensure that the computer knows where to find us. Now that we have computerised every register in Britain, we are coming up against the problem that some of the registers are inaccurate to an unacceptable degree. If we move house, we should ensure that, along with the post office and the gas board, the doctor knows our new address. In these ways we will have a cost-effective and confident service and save lives.

I should like to deal with one or two matters on the cervical cancer programme about which women have written to me. I have no doubt that the hon. Ladies in the House will raise these points, so perhaps I can take the opportunity now to deal with them. Many women want to know why we do not reduce the recommended time interval between smear tests from five years to three years. The guidance that we issued in January says:

"recall should be at least every five years".

Most deaths occur in women who have never had a smear test. We know that a five-year screening programme can reduce deaths among women screened by an estimated 84 per cent.

For this reason, we believe that increasing the proportion of women being screened at all should take precedence over increasing the frequency of screening. In terms of saving lives, we are trying to get from a very low figure to 84 per cent.—and we are not there yet. That accords with advice given to us by Professor Jocelyn Chamberlain and her team at the DHSS cancer screening evaluation unit, which is based at the Royal Marsden hospital in Sutton.

We are not pressing health authorities to recall women more frequently than at five-year intervals, but we will not hinder them from doing so. I know that some district health authorities have decided to recall after three years. Before DHAs move from five-year screening to three-year screening I would expect them to have satisfied themselves on two points. First, they should be getting a high response from the women in the eligible age range, but particularly from older women who have never been screened before. Secondly, they should be able to run the system smoothly without laboratory backlogs or delays in diagnosis and treatment. We monitor laboratory backlogs very closely.

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) is in the Chamber, and no doubt he will tell us about one or two laboratory backlogs in his area. As I say, we monitor the backlogs very closely and have been pressing districts to take action where there is a persistent problem. Three quarters of district health authorities do not have any backlog to report.

If we did not insist on these rules, there is a risk that we would overload the laboratories. The same, keen women would come in to be tested repeatedly and we would miss many of the women most at risk and might waste everybody's time and money.

There are other cancers which affect women. The most worrying of these is lung cancer which is rapidly rising. Since 1979, the death rate from lung cancer among men in the United Kingdom has dropped by 6 per cent. but among women it has risen by 27 per cent., and that is causing considerable alarm. Lung cancer is the second largest cancer killer of women in this country and accounted for 11,000 dead women last year. It looks set to overtake the major cancer killer—breast cancer. The survival rate over five years of women with lung cancer is very poor—betwen 3 and 13 per cent. according to age.

Cigarettes offer women more than the long-term worries about cancer. They interfere with hormone levels in both men and women, and on average lead to the menopause five years earlier. Nobody believes me about that but that is what the research shows. Smoking is regarded as having a role in the increased incidence of osteoporosis. I have mentioned the well-documented link between cervical cancer and smoking. A recent study in the United States of America has suggested that just a few cigarettes a day doubles our risk of heart problems. Worst of all we know that, among pregnant women who smoke, the risk of perinatal mortality is 28 per cent. higher than for a non-smoker. It is also associated with a significant reduction in birth weight by as much as half a pound. The effect of smoking on the baby can be both rapid and devastating.

I suppose that many women believe that smoking keeps them slim, but there are sensible ways to keep one's weight at a healthy level without taking up a habit that stands a good chance of doing irreparable damage to one's health and the health of one's baby. Some people say they smoke to deal with stress, but there are healthy options to deal with stress and most people, including most doctors, have found other ways.

For all these reasons we are very concerned about patterns of smoking behaviour among girls and young women. Smoking has been falling in older women in recent years, but that had not been happening among women under the age of 25. Among secondary schoolchildren in England and Wales, who fortunately still smoke far less than their parents, girl smokers outnumber boys by nearly two to one. As I said in a debate on 23 October, we commissioned research on this to try to find what influences the behaviour of girls in this way. Preliminary results suggest that girls are influenced in a different way from boys.

I have asked the Health Education Council to look at a sustained programme of health education aimed at young people. We have accepted the Froggatt report which recommended:

"It is essential that more smokers are encouraged to stop smoking; and that non-smokers are strongly discouraged from starting".

We are now considering how best to take that forward. I am pleased to see that the Royal College of Nursing, the largest trade union in the National Health Service, representing about 250,000 women, recently adopted a no smoking policy, as has the Royal College of Midwives and the Health Visitors' Association, both of which have a preponderance of women members. In the DHSS, where we employ about 100,000 people, the majority of them female, I understand that no smoking policy guidelines will soon be issued to local social security offices with the support of the trade unions. We look to see considerable progress there to help all our excellent staff work in a smoke-free atmosphere.

In ways like these we shall continue to do what we can to promote health education and disease prevention campaigns such as those for women's cancer. We watch with interest developments for screening for other conditions such as ovarian cancer, although we are nowhere near a sound, accurate system that we could use nationwide.

Similarly, we are keen to encourage the development of laboratory tests which are less demanding of scarce staff than the current smear test reading method. However, as my right hon. Friend the Minister of Health said in the Adjournment debate on the organisation Quest for a Test for Cancer on 13 May, any new test we adopt must be cheap, effective, fast, accurate and robust. By robust we mean that it should be capable of being performed in different types of laboratories and by operators with varied levels of skills. I am hopeful that some automated system will come in before too long. I was impressed that a recent meeting of our scientific advisers had 13 such proposals to consider, some of which looked promising.

It might be helpful if I say a word about the growing involvement of the private sector in screening programmes, which we welcome. For a long time preventive medicine was the poor relation in the NHS and we have much catching up to do. The private and non profit-making sectors stepped in to fill the gap and have developed their schemes to the benefit of their millions of members. I understand that more than 150 clinics of various kinds are now in operation. There are two main points I would make to them and their customers.

First, it is not enough to offer simply a testing service. Proper arrangements should be made for laboratory services and to notify the woman's GP that she has been tested and of the results, subject to her consent. That is intended to avoid unnecessary repetition of tests especially as the National Health Service gets it own screening services up and running. Further sensible arrangements should be made for the care, counselling and treatment of women and they should be explained to the customer when she first comes. This also applies to occupational health screening, such as the splendid system that I saw at the Post Office last week, which uses the services, where required, of AMI International and thus relieves the National Health Service of the burden entirely.

Secondly, those setting up such screening systems should be well aware of the good medical reasons why we do not screen younger women for breast cancer. In women under 35, for example, the condition is rare, but benign lumps and cysts are very common. The mammogram used under these circumstances is likely to pick up a high level of false positives, leading to unnecessary anguish until the all-clear is obtained and, worse, possibly to unnecessary treatment. Mr. Ian Fentiman of the Imperial Cancer Research Fund unit at Guy's hospital has expressed his concern about that matter, and I share it. I hope that the reputable companies involved will take note.

We are pleased that the private sector is taking steps to provide a quality assurance scheme supported by a system of registration, inspection and approval. We shall watch that development with interest.

There is no doubt about the growing interest in women's health inside the House and among the population at large. This has led my Department to respond by organising a full-day conference on the subject on 22 June. The many subjects covered will include the cancers that I have mentioned, but the afternoon session will look at conditions which do not kill, but from which millions of women suffer, often silently, such as mental illness—in which women outnumber men—the menopause—problems associated with which were regarded until quite recently as either imaginary or untreatable—and osteoporosis, the thinning of the bones, which is increasingly filling accident and emergency departments and orthopaedic beds. There will be a session on puerperal psychosis, which is an appalling mental illness that affects some women after childbirth and can vanish as quickly as it came, leaving havoc in its wake in the woman's family. The conference is designed to have learned speakers sharing the latest information with lay people, including representatives of more than 50 women's organisations, and press representatives who write on women's issues and health. Many hon. Members and Members of the other place have accepted invitations to attend.

Since some important new issues will be covered on that day, it will be apparent that the Government want to move the discussion on. We have put our efforts against cancer on a sound footing, but now we must turn our attention elsewhere. Osteoporosis, for example, is a condition which probably affects one woman in four, and is clearly linked to falls in hormone levels after the menopause.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): Is the Minister aware that, because of cuts in the district health authority's budget, a consultant in Sheffield has taken out a bank overdraft to keep his unit, which conducts care and research into osteoporosis, going? I welcome the Minister's concern about this issue, but will she ensure that he is given money to run the unit and so that he can pay off his overdraft?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Lady should beware of challenging me on such topics. I had a healthy supper with the extremely eminent physician concerned on Tuesday night. We discussed some of the circumstances surrounding his work. The press has been less aware of the fact that he receives £700,000 for his research from the Medical Research Council. It was suggested that he might like to discuss what he will want to do in the future with the regional health authority, the district health authority and the Medical Research Council. I believe that that is now happening. The reason why I had supper with him was that I have invited him to be one of the speakers at the conference. The work being done on osteoporosis in units such as the MRC-funded one in Sheffield is important, and I have conveyed that interest to the health authorities concerned. I hope that that answers the hon. Lady's question.

Osteoporosis is 10 times commoner among women than men, and among older women it often shows itself as dowager's hump. Women can lose as much as 6 inches in height a year as spinal bones collapse. One realises, when looking around our towns and villages, how many women suffer from that painful and disabling condition. I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) is in her place primed to give the answer. She is aware of the close interest that my Department is taking in the work of the Amarant trust, which she chairs, and which advocates hormone replacement therapy. My hon. Friend will, I know, understand our caution about any treatment which involves drug therapy over a long period. I hope that she will also feel able to support and advocate those preventive measures, which are emerging from research, as the best advice to women, particularly before they reach menopause: do not smoke and stay physically active so that the bone mass is maintained. There is evidence that bone mass is significantly greater among women who take regular exercise than among those who do not. Even for post-menopausal women, exercise can slow down the rate of loss, or even reverse it somewhat. So, I am afraid that it is on with the tracksuits girls, and leave those fags at home, and I invite all hon. Members to join me. Incidentally, HRT, where appropriate, is available on the National Health Service. Patients are not obliged to seek private treatment.

Among the other organisations that are interested and involved, we help the National Osteoporosis Society, the Women's Aid Federation,—the battered wives organisation—and Maternity Alliance. We grant-aid the Widows Advisory Trust, the Miscarriage Association and many other organisations. Our male colleagues would be surprised if they saw a list of the wide range of groups concerned with women's health that we support.

The other main chunk of work carried out for women, which has experienced important developments lately, is maternity care. As it will not be one of the subjects discussed at the women's conference, I shall spend a few moments considering it. Since 1981, following the Social Services Select Committee report on perinatal mortality, vigorous efforts have been made to improve services. We set up the maternity services advisory committee, which published three reports under the title "Maternity Care in Action". The first, in 1982, was entitled "Antenatal Care", the second, in 1984, was entitled "Care during Childbirth", and the third, in 1985, was entitled "Postnatal and Neonatal Care". Those reports are a comprehensive guide to good practice and a plan for action for health authorities.

The resulting improvements in perinatal mortality are well-known. Between 1979 and 1987, the death rate among babies in the first month after birth dropped from 14·6 per 1,000 live births to 8·9 per 1,000 live births. It is more revealing if we look at absolute numbers. In 1979, there were just over 600,000 births and nearly 5,000 stillbirths, whereas in 1987 there were 645,000 births—many more pregnancies went to full term—and only 3,200 stillbirths. Far more babies are being born alive. We had therefore about 40,000 more babies to care for last year than in 1979.

Similarly, the chances of survival of tiny, low-birthweight babies have improved dramatically. In 1976, there were 38,000 births below 2·5 kg—about 5·5 lb—of whom 84 per cent. survived. In 1987, there were over 45,000 births below 2·5 kg, of whom 92 per cent. survived. Many thousands more tiny babies now survive every year. The amount of care needed to achieve that success is enormous. The object of the exercise is a healthy baby and a contented mother and family.

Over a 10-year period—indeed, a 20-year period—some matters have not improved. In 1976, the number of low-birthweight babies born alive represented about 6·5 per cent. of the total. In 1986, it was 6·8 per cent. The figure has been about 7 per cent. for over 20 years. The failure of the these statistics to change is a matter of considerable concern. Low-birthweight babies are far more likely to be sick babies in the future. They have a far higher death rate in the first few months of life, when they seem especially prone to infections.

In some parts of the country, such as Leeds, which I visited last year, the proportion of low-birthweight babies is over 9 per cent., yet in Scandinavia it is 3 per cent. In Scandinavia, a higher proportion of babies go to full term and are born at full weight. We do not know why our figures are so high, except that perhaps there is a link with smoking. A drop in the birthweight of the baby and increased perinatal mortality are directly linked to the number of cigarettes smoked. Therefore, heavy smoking is likely to produce a stronger effect.

We undertook a survey of health authority maternity care in 1985 following the MSAC reports, but we propose to write again to the district health authorities in England and ask how they are implementing MSAC. This time we shall particularly look at the antenatal care side and at the levels of care in the community. We are looking for responses within less than 12 months.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): The hon. Lady referred to care within the community. Is she aware of the deep concern in rural parts of England, Wales and Scotland about the large number of general practitioner units that have been closed that offered very effective neonatal and maternity care to women, without their having to travel long distances to high-tech centres?

Mrs. Currie: Yes, I recognise that fact. When we receive responses to our new survey of antenatal care, we shall consider the extent to which we can provide out-patient care as close to home as possible, while at the same time enabling women to have access to the latest facilities in the services that are most appropriate to them. There may need to be more of a division between facilities. I shall refer later to isolated units.

Much of the improvement in baby mortality is well known. What is less well known is the sharp drop in the death rate of women in childbirth that has accompanied all these improvements. Forty years ago, when I was born, the number of births a year was roughly the same as it is now, but some 700 women died in or soon after childbirth. Even 10 years ago it was 74, a rate of 12 per 100,000 live births. Now it is seven per 100,000 live births, but, at 45 cases in the most recent year for which we have figures, it is still too many. Nevertheless, it shows a continued improvement.

We have given a lot of thought to this subject and we have done a lot of work on it. I attribute much of this welcome change and the drop in the death rate of babies and mothers to our efforts in maternity care. It has involved far more women giving birth in hospital. Most now follow the recommendation that births should take place in modern hospitals that provide a full range of services, including anaesthetics and a paediatrician on call. I recognise that, where they still exist, people say that they like small, isolated maternity units, but we are still advised to move away from delivering women in such units.

Such advice was included in a recent publication of the National Birthday Trust Fund. I believe that it is wise to continue to take that advice. Fewer women and fewer babies are dying. The results have convinced me. I am also convinced that it should be possible—that in fact it is essential—to provide modern maternity care in a way that is both professional and friendly. I say that firmly.

I referred to sick babies. When a child is ill, the presence in hospital of the mother or another close relative may be an essential element in the child's recovery. I agree firmly with the National Association for the Welfare of Children in Hospital on these matters. I hope to be able to issue new draft guidelines for consultation within the next four weeks which will update those issued in 1972. The hon.

Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) knows that that fulfils a promise that I made in Committee on the Health and Medicines Bill.

The last topic that I want to cover is still concerned with women and their babies. It is breast feeding. This week, we made an announcement that is of considerable significance. Since 1980, the proportion of women breast feeding has stood at around two thirds, but the most recent survey in 1985 showed that, while 85 per cent. of educated and social classes 1 and 2 women breast-feed their babies, only 45 per cent. of social class 5 do, which is rather the reverse of what I should have expected. In January, we published the latest report on infant feeding from the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food Policy, entitled "Present Day Practice in Infant Feeding: Third Report." It affirms:

"Breast feeding from a woman who is in good health and nutritional status provides a complete food which is unique to the species. There is no better nutrition for healthy infants both at term and during the early months of life."

The significance of that for us today is that there is plenty of medical evidence that natural feeding is better for both the baby and the mother. It returns her to normal far more quickly. It also helps to cement a very special bond between her and her baby, to their mutual advantage. I have to confess that it is also very nice, so we want to promote it.

I have therefore agreed to support a new initiative to promote breast feeding around the country by the National Childbirth Trust's breast feeding promotion group, the La Leche League and the Association of Breastfeeding Mothers. We will grant aid these bodies for a sustained campaign among health professionals and mothers. We expect to spend at least £100,000 over the next two years. In addition, the infant and diatetic foods association of the Food and Drink Federation, whose members make infant formulae, have agreed this week to provide an additional £30,000 this year, and possibly next year as well, to help with the printing and dissemination of suitable breast-feeding literature, posters and so on. I think that that is a remarkable gesture, and I congratulate and thank the association.

But the manufacturers have done more. They have agreed to phase out by the end of this year all free samples and subsidised supplies of baby milk to hospitals, thus closing an important loophole. The bottle and teat manufacturers have agreed to consult on ending their advertising to the general public along the same lines as the baby milk manufacturers. I accept with gratitude the good wishes of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley), who is smiling. All these changes bring us into line with the World Health Organisation's requirements on marketing breast milk substitutes, promulgated in 1981 and strengthened in 1986. We shall be revising the relevant NHS circular. We intend to issue the new version in the autumn when the manufacturers issue a revised complementary marketing code—I hope in time for a major seminar on 18 October—which will launch the new breast-feeding promotion initiative.

Ms. Harman: Does the hon. Lady accept that one of the concerns of midwives is that the shortage of midwives, and the extra pressure in maternity units because of the cuts in maternity beds at a time when the number of births is increasing, means that midwives do not have the time to help mothers to establish breast feeding? We welcome the hon. Lady's interest and concern and we share her concern about the drop in the percentage of women who are breast feeding their children, but that makes it crucial for midwives to have enough time to help mothers to establish breast feeding. They feel, and I share their view, that they do not have enough time because of the growing crisis in maternity wards that has been caused by financial pressures.

Mrs. Currie: As the hon. Lady knows, because I have responded to these points on numerous occasions, the number of midwives is increasing. What is more important, the proportion of qualified staff has risen sharply. Therefore, I am content that the National Health Service and the professional side are devoting the appropriate level of resources to this subject. We must ensure that the health professionals realise how important and valuable it is to assist women.

However, the evidence suggests that much of the help, support and encouragement for breast feeding comes best from other women in the same neighbourhood and with the same accents who have been doing it and who are therefore conscious of the pleasure that it gives and of some of the difficulties—and how to overcome them. In that sense, I hope that the new campaign will be directed at both the professionals and, through the voluntary movement, at the women concerned.

We think that we can make considerable progress. Then we shall be able truly to say that we will be promoting breast feeding as best for both the baby and the mother. I cannot conceal my delight that we are making progress in this way on an entirely voluntary basis. It puts us well ahead of the rest of the European Community and most of the developed world.

We are most emphatically not complacent. There are still far too few women who never book their confinement and who first appear in an advanced stage of labour, often too late to save their baby. There are still too many women who die in childbirth. There are far too many women who have never had a cervical smear test, and I fear that there will be always some who refuse. There are too many doctors who dismiss women's menopausal symptoms, and too few of them advise their women patients on how to avoid thinning bones—osteoporosis—in the first place.

There are too many women, particularly among the young, who dismiss our warnings about smoking. Most of all, there are still far too many women who suffer in silence when they should be seeking help. Often they wait until it is too late. The House should firmly reject the notion that a responsible women cares for her family's health but neglects her own. Today's wife and mother knows that her family need her to be fit and well, as does her employer, if she is to meet the increasing demands that are now placed upon women in this country. Our health is in our hands. I hope that all generations of women will in future take a positive and informed interest in their own health.

The programmes that I have outlined make me feel very proud. I think that we in Britain are lucky to have these opportunities, and I commend the programmes to the House.

10.19 am

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): My hon. Friends and I are glad that the Government have chosen the subject of women's health for debate. I do not denigrate the value of Friday debates but in some ways wish that the debate could have been held in prime time during the week, when more hon. Members could have been here; I know that many hon. Members have to get away on Fridays. Nevertheless, I am glad to see that a representative number of hon. Members are present.

Doubtless the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security will recall that we had a debate about cervical cancer screening during our recent proceedings on the Health and Medicines Bill. We now have the opportunity to consider all aspects of women's health and to identify and discuss some of the problems facing women, especially women who have little money and who are hampered in trying to live a healthy life. I am a little disappointed that in the catalogue that the Minister gave us, she took a rather blinkered view in some respects; she confined her remarks to the medical aspects of women's health without considering the social causes that often lead to women's ill health. Nevertheless, the fact that the Government have chosen women's health as the subject of this debate is an acknowledgement of the fact that they have begun to take it much more seriously. In that regard, I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) who did much as shadow Minister for Health and to my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) who is doing much now to push the Minister to accept various schemes.

I begin by firmly dismissing the Minister's oft-expressed contention that many of the problems of women's health are women's own fault. The hon. Lady is very fond of expressing herself in lurid language. She has not done so today, but she would acknowledge that she frequently does. I wonder whether she realises just how hurtful that lurid language is to women struggling in an unjust society to maintain their families and to keep them together, to find and keep a job and to cope with bad working and housing conditions. For women who are home workers the last two often go together. There was an interesting article in last Sunday's edition of The Observer dealing with the problems, including health problems, facing home workers. I shall do no more than quote the remarks of a women whose case was cited in that article:

"I used to work a 90-hour week to get the money I needed to live. My daughters used to come in from school, eat and start sewing . . . We were absolutely desperate for money . . . I challenge anybody to check, sew and label a dozen sweaters at the rate they set and earn more than 66p an hour."

The Minister may think that that quotation is irrelevant to a debate about women's health. However, poverty is one of the conditions that take a toll on women's health. Judging by her speech, the hon. Lady does not even begin to understand that. I hope that she will not mind my reminding her that on 11 March 1985, before she was a Minister, she made a speech on unemployment and industrial policies. She advocated the employment of part-time women workers as opposed to male full-time workers, who she said had all the protection of employment legislation. She also said that full-time male workers

"will probably receive holidays and so on."—[Official Report, 11 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 87.]

The implication is that women can work without the benefit of a yearly break that might help their health. The Government have removed what minimal protection women had and fulfilled the Minister's hopes as expressed in that speech by decreasing the rights of workers and the obligations of employers. They have increased the risks to women in terms of stress, which has a profound effect on their health.

I shall deal briefly with women's health in connection with work and I hope that my hon. Friends will discuss the matter at greater length. The 9·5 million women now in work account for 45 per cent. of the work force. At work women often cope with equipment designed specifically for men. They suffer from the same health problems at work as men but they are also subject to specific problems such as tendonitis and to the scandals of VDUs. Those are just two of the problems that predominantly affect women. When shopping, I have often noticed the problems faced by women at the check-out and I have discussed those problems with them. They often have to sit in an awkward position on a swivel stool handing goods from the basket on to the counter with one hand and using the other to check up the price. I have noticed that many of them rub their shoulders and complain of back ache. All such factors cause women stress and strain and bad health.

All too often women's work does not end at the factory gate or the door of the shop. Most women still have the sole or major responsibility for looking after the home and many are carers who care for the old, the sick and the young. In recent years many reports have highlighted the problems arising from those circumstances. It is to their credit that most trade unions—notably, the National Union of Public Employees—are taking up with employers issues such as stress and its effect on women's health.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I have a genuine point, which is not a point of argument. I want to solicit further information. Unless my ears misled me, the hon. Lady referred to the "scandals of VDUs". I would like to know what she meant. As I understand it, a great deal of the clerical work that women used to do—for example that involving heavy filing cabinets—has been made infinitely easier by access to modern technology and the equipment that goes with it.

Ms. Richardson: I shall gladly elaborate. I agree that I used a shorthand phrase, perhaps I should have explained more fully what I meant by the scandals of VDUs. We accept that VDUs have decreased the work load and made the work easier than it was with the old filing and call and recall system. However, I am sure that it will not have escaped the attention of the Minister for Health that VDUs involve health hazards. I do not think that enough is done to ensure that employers take that into account.

The Ministers are looking puzzled. Sitting for too long in front of a VDU can affect health. There is a risk to a woman's reproductive capabilities. I am amazed that the Minister looks surprised to hear that fact, because it is common knowledge. Indeed, many unions and employers have a written agreement limiting the number of hours that someone can sit in front of a VDU, precisely because of that risk. That is what I meant by "scandal", but perhaps I should have said "hazard". It is certainly something that must be borne in mind.

Before the Minister's welcome interruption I was discussing problems at work. The Government have compounded the difficulties facing women through their attacks on maternity rights and parental leave. The Government preside over legislation designed specifically to encourage low wages and, in some cases, dangerous conditions, and to erode the rights of individuals.

Work should offer the opportunity of better health screening and education and should enhance women's lives. Instead, during the past nine years much gained in previous years has been eroded. On a number of recent occasions, and certainly at some length today, the Under-Secretary has berated women for smoking. She did not refer to drinking today, although she has referred to that and other habits on many occasions. I was stunned when I heard her attributing smoking to the desire of women to keep slim. It is a long time since I heard that one. Most of the women I know who smoke do so because they are under some stress. They do not necessarily want to smoke. I smoke, and I do so because I like it—but that is my problem. I certainly do not do it because of stress.

Many women smoke because of stress caused by poor housing or work or family problems. They smoke not to keep slim but because they are nervous and under stress, and smoking provides some form of release for them. I am a little surprised that the hon. Lady did not acknowledge that. Indeed, it is downright offensive to talk about women in the way that she did and to blame them for seeking relief from tensions that, in many ways, the Government have forced upon them. After all, the Government capitulate to the tobacco and alcohol businesses whenever there is a call for action against advertisements deliberately aimed at the young and at women. Blaming the victim is an obnoxious practice and is always an unproductive and futile exercise.

Does the hon. Lady really believe that women are less aware than men of health risks, or that they are more difficult to educate than men? Does she believe that they are simply more reckless or feckless than men about the lifestyle and health of themselves and their families? I hope that she does not believe that; I cannot believe that she does. However, that is the logical interpretation of some of her outbursts that sometimes, although I am sure she does not mean them to be so, sound almost sexist—until, that is, we place them in the context of the rest of the Government's policies.

The Secretary of State for Social Services presides over a social security system founded on the Victorian values of the deserving and the undeserving poor, while the hon. Lady wants to found the Health Service on the values of the deserving and the undeserving sick. Unlike Conservative Members, the Opposition want all women to have the best available health case and health opportunities, regardless of ability to pay.

The hon. Lady proudly mentioned the role of the private sector in breast cancer screening. I accept that it has a role, but I should prefer all such screening to be carried out within the NHS. A letter dated 4 January 1988 from the London hospital Whitechapel, addressed to one of my constituents, has caused me some surprise. It refers to the first stage of an ovarian cancer screening project in which my constituent had participated. It said that the project had yielded valuable and exciting results that would shortly be published in The Lancet. It said that it would dramatically improve the outlook for the 4,000 women a year who died from ovarian cancer.

To my amazement, the letter's writer said:

"There are two ways in particular that early participants in the project such as yourself can ensure its continuation: (1) By helping us to raise sufficient money to complete the project by selling tickets for our 1988 raffle."

It is amazing that a woman who has taken part in a project to help her health and that of other women should be asked to buy a raffle ticket so that other women can also participate. Is that private health care, semi-private health care, supported health care or sponsored health care? We should fund such projects properly and not depend upon people buying raffle tickets.

The Government must fully provide properly resourced services that genuinely promote health, as well as meeting the needs of women when they are sick. Promoting good health means challenging the causes of ill health, such as poor diet, poor housing and homelessness. What about the hundreds and thousands of women currently living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation? That is hardly a healthy life. They are expected to care for their families in one room and they have to leave the accommodation and stay out all day. I do not know how they can be expected to provide a healthy diet in such circumstances. The Government do very little to help those problems. Other causes of ill health are unemployment, unsafe and stressful working conditions in the workplace and at home, the dual load of unemployment and caring responsibilities and poverty and powerlessness.

Every health study has shown that poverty is one of the most important factors influencing life and health chances, so we should not increase the poverty of those who are already the poorest in our society. The Government's record is second to that of no Government this century, as is shown by the first increase on the infant mortality rate since 1970. An article in The Health Services Journal headed:

"Why are our babies dying?"

states:

"A rise in the infant death rate in England and Wales—the first since 1970—is causing concern among community service managers and staff. The most recent figures from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) show that the number of deaths of children under the age of one, internationally accepted as an important indicator of health and social conditions, rose from 9·4 per 1,000 births to 9·6, an increase from 6,141 deaths in 1985 to 6,313 in 1986 . . . but initial response from health professionals suggests that social deprivation, not gaps in medical services, is the underlying cause."

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Lady should know that we shall shortly have to hand more recent figures that show that mortality rates have dropped again. They have dropped below what the trend line would have been. That is precisely why I am now so concerned about smoking behaviour in young women. They are the only group whose smoking behaviour is increasing. As I demonstrated, the effect on the baby is immediate and devastating. It helps to cause perinatal mortality and reduce the chances of babies who are born alive.

Ms. Richardson: Again, the hon. Lady has blamed young women who smoke. Smoking may be a contributory factor, but she has not answered the point, which was that health professionals believe that of the increase in that period. I am still amazed that the hon. Lady has not taken that fact into account.

"social deprivation, not gaps in medical services, is the underlying cause"

During Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday, there were references to a report from the Low Pay Unit and the Child Poverty Action Group. It showed that between 1979 and 1985—I acknowledge that it was three years ago—the number of people below pension age living on or below the poverty line rose from 2·9 million to 6·54 million, a rise of 120 per cent. It is no good the Government saying as they tried to do yesterday, that it is an old report and that things have got better since then. I promise the hon. Lady that things have not got better since then. The figures have not dropped—in fact, they will get worse. With the poll tax, more people will drop into the poverty trap.

The hon. Lady referred with pride to working with the Maternity Alliance and other organisations. I am glad that she acknowledges their worth. Four years ago, the Maternity Alliance produced a report called "Poverty in Pregnancy". The report looked in detail at the basic requirements for a healthy, nutritional diet for pregnant women. It concluded that pregnant women whose income came from benefits and those in very low wage families had incomes which were clearly insufficient to buy an adequate diet which would ensure their own and their babies' future good health. It estimated that benefits needed to be increased by at least one third, that the maternity grant needed to be restored to its original value, which at that time would have been £125, and that the seriously inadequate welfare foods policy needed radical improvement.

We have certainly had radical change since then, but we have not had radical improvement. The social security review has cut benefits and removed one of the most vulnerable groups—the under-16s—from any benefit. At one time, the maternity grant, albeit at a low level, was universal. It is now available only to those who are on benefit. Free school meals have gone, and welfare foods have been cut.

Does the Under-Secretary really believe that such actions—and by her own Department, too—are the right way to ensure that women have a good start for themselves and their families and have a healthy life?

The feminisation of poverty is not a new phenomenom. The hon. Lady quoted some women's journals from perhaps 100 years ago. At the beginning of the century, 60 per cent. of all Poor Law recipients were women. In 1988, 60 per cent. of all income support recipients are women. It is truly staggering that things have not changed over 88 years. Three quarters of the low paid are women. Yesterday's copy of The Independent contained a whole page of little bits on regional trends that were recently published by the Government. The article is headed:

"Women's pay still lags behind"

An extract states:

"Progress towards equal pay appears extremely slow. Women's pay still lags far behind men in every part of the country, irrespective of prosperity.

The highest-paid women are in the South-east, where average weekly earnings are £167·60p, is well short of the earnings of the worst-paid men, who are in Northern Ireland and take home an average of £190·40p.

Women in manual jobs fare worst of all, averaging only £115·30 a week—£70 less than their male counterparts. Although these are full-time jobs, more than half the women so employed in East Anglia and Northern Ireland earn less than £100."

All those factors are relevant to our discussion about women's health. Thousands of women actually have to earn their poverty by working in the NHS and related local authority community services and subsequently get as a bonus ill health and a lack of opportunity to choose a healthier lifestyle. I refer to nurses, therapists, administrators, technical workers, caterers, cleaners, laundry workers, home helps, day care and respite care workers, and, of course, the millions of unpaid carers at home, who are often isolated and unsupported in caring for their loved ones and who had to fight the Government through the European courts for financial recognition. All such people are low paid and below the threshold laid down by the Council of Europe.

We have just received an important report from the Policy Studies Institute on doctors and their careers. That report was commissioned by the DHSS. [Interruption.] The Under-Secretary points to herself. It was commissioned by her. I hope that she is interested in the results. So far, I have managed to read only the shortened version, as the longer one rather defeated me in the time available.

The pattern of discrimination and career prospects for women doctors mirrors the picture that we see everywhere. If there is a hierarchy, women are in powerless positions. If there is a grading structure, women are at the bottom of it. If there are pay differentials, women are on the lowest rates. The description of the effects on women doctors of working in the Health Service hold true of women in all professions and all women working in health and community services. The report states:

"Exhausting and stressful hours of work"—

Perhaps hon. Ladies will include the House of Commons in this—

"disrupted or non-existent family and social life, endless exams, the repeated scramble for short-term jobs that involve moving around the country, inflexible career structures and the increasing importance of patronage from powerful, and usually, male senior doctors, all conspire against women."

With the addition of a few substitute words, we could adapt that paragraph to refer to the House of Commons. However, that is a quote about women doctors, though it applies across the board in most professions. Yet, as we know, access to a woman doctor is now one of the most frequent requests that women voice with regard to their own health needs. Information on the availability of a woman GP is one of the most frequent responses made by a family practitioner committee, yet the Government's White Paper, "Promoting Better Health" will threaten the availability of women GPs and the services they offer. I do not know whether the Minister has seen the response of Women in Medicine. I assume that she has. It is a responsible organisation of women doctors and says that many of the proposals threaten the availability of women GPs and the services they offer.

"The White Paper does not recognise or reward those aspects of work, often done by women GPs, which cannot be easily measured, such as the many forms of counselling. Instead, its emphasis is on a few countable targets, eg immunisations and cervical smears. Indeed, women could well be employed specifically to work in these limited areas of practice. They would lose job satisfaction, be inaccessible for consultation on other matters, and their wide range of skills would be wasted.

Changes in the way doctors are paid would encourage GPs to have more patients on their books. This would mean less time could be spent with each individual. Women, for a variety of reasons, on average consult their doctors more often than men do, and with more complicated problems. They, therefore, would be the hardest hit. . . .

Proposed changes threaten to remove valuable allowances from doctors who work reduced hours."

I hope that the Minister will take those views into account.

Support among women throughout the country for well woman centres has grown enormously. The services are run by women for women. Health education and mutual aid are provided in a positive and supportive manner. Well woman centres adopt an approach which encompasses the whole person rather than a set of symptoms. The whole person in her environment and its impact on her health is considered. That includes income, access to child care and community care, employment or unemployment, housing conditions, diet and the availability of healthy food in local shops and the sufficiency of income to buy it. All of those matters can be discussed in a well women centre.

I know that the Minister is a avid fan of healthy food. We all are, or ought to be.

Mrs. Currie: Yes.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I like hamburgers.

Ms. Richardson: So do I, but we must remember that traditional healthy food such as wholemeal bread is more expensive than the white plastic bread which most families have to buy. When the Minister talks about healthy food, she sometimes ignores many women's poverty.

A friend of mine lived in Brixton until recently—she moved because she changed jobs. She is a vegetarian, and tells me that she found it extremely difficult to buy her kind of healthy food in Brixton. Wholemeal bread and yoghurt for example, were difficult to find in the supermarkets because they are too expensive for the people of Lambeth to buy.

I did not hear the programme, but I understand that the Minister was on the radio yesterday introducing a recipe book. I do not know whether she wrote it herself, but I understand that it costs £14, which is quite a lot.

Mrs. Currie: It is a book for caterers.

Ms Richardson: I suppose that we are not intended to see it.

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Lady may not be aware that the book of recipes that we launched yesterday is not really intended for the general public—it is a caterers' book. Caterers repeatedly request that we provide recipes that accord with the latest recommendations. We have done just that.

Ms. Richardson: Perhaps we can have one in the House of Commons. It sounds a good idea and I hope that caterers in hospitals, who the hon. Lady says have asked her to produce the book, will be able to afford the ingredients on their reduced funding. We should not simply say that people should buy healthy food—we must remember its cost.

The development of mobile and workplace health care and screening facilities are another development of women's own work and campaigning to improve the quality and quantity of health services. I pay tribute to the work of women in what may loosely be called the women's health movement and to the trade unions who have played an important role in persuading employers to make workplace screening available. It has often been a long and difficult task, as the campaign for workplace screening in the House shows. We are now to have it at last.

I trust that our next success will be workplace child care, out-of-school care and parental and family leave as of right. One day we may get this place into shape. An integrated approach to economic, social and health policies is essential if we are to promote good health and well-being for all women. That is what the Government and the hon. Lady are failing to do.

One-day seminars and one-off conferences are utterly insufficient. I apologise to the Minister for being unable, for very good reasons, to come to her conference on Wednesday. I know that she was anxious to make her announcement. I do not believe that such conferences have the power to embark on the cross-departmental action that is needed. They are useful in their own way—I am not patronising them or putting them down—but I would have preferred it if the hon. Lady had called a cross-departmental conference to consider the medical aspects of women's health, and the social causes of their problems to see how we can bring the whole thing together.

Women are the majority of NHS consumers because of their own health and because of their caring responsibilities for others. A wide range of health care needs and problems are experienced exclusively by women, such as maternity needs, menopause, pre-menstrual syndrome, post-natal depression and problems arising from use of the contraceptive pill or the intra-uterine device. In spite of the catalogue that the Minister gave us in that respect, the Government's policies are robbing and short changing women.

The NHS collects no data on the ethnic origin of patients, so the extent to which it meets the needs of women from ethnic minorities is difficult to judge. We know, however, that research on conditions such as sickle cell anaemia and thalassaemia, which are life-threatening in some cases, has been given a low priority.

Similarly, we have been too slow to respond to the needs of women for whom English is not their first language. As we all know, communication between doctor, nurse and patient is essential to confidence and good care. The London borough of Hackney is an excellent example of good practice. Its multi-ethnic women's health project employs five part-time workers, speaking Turkish, Urdu, Gujerati and Bengali. That ensures two-way communication, not just to explain the procedures to patients, but to assist in an exchange and dialogue between health workers and patients.

The Government's policies have cynically and deliberately engineered a crisis in the Health Service so that they can introduce market forces and further privatisation into our health system. The impact on women's health of those policies has already been dramatic and detrimental. Hospital and bed closures have reduced gynaecology beds by 10 per cent. obstetric beds by 8 per cent. and GP maternity beds by 40 per cent. The lengthening waiting list, as a result of the loss of beds for children and elderly patients, means that women are providing even more care at home, losing work time and income and suffering even greater stress.

Last Friday a woman came to see me about her 78-year-old mother whose legs had finally given way so that she could no longer walk. The mother weighs 17 stone. She is confined to bed. She needs a bed from which there is a hoist so that she can pull herself up, and then her 78-year-old husband can help her on to the bed pan. That is a fairly familiar story. A nurse visits three times a day simply to help with those bodily functions. However, most of the caring is down to the 78-year-old husband and the daughter.

I spoke to the health visitor on Monday. She said, "It is a tragedy, Ms. Richardson, that we do not have more of these beds readily available." We must depend on people such as my constituent, the daughter, who not only has to do these extra duties, as well as trying to maintain a full time job to keep her own family, but who feels a terrible sense of guilt about her mother—guilt that, perhaps, she has not done enough. We too infrequently acknowledge the great debt which we owe carers in our society, who have saved the health and community services so much money.

Special care baby units have suffered an 8 per cent. cut. The crisis in community care is rapidly approaching a position of community neglect.

The cervical cancer screening programme on which the Under-Secretary has given a lot of information is, frankly, a shambles. I have written to the hon. Lady telling her that I have already received information on this matter. For example, I am told that in Winchester and Basingstoke the computer call and recall system that came into operation only on 1 April this year is already out of action and cannot be restored because of lack of resources. I am also informed that call and recall letters will not be sent out, regardless of the problems with the computer, because the laboratories cannot cope with the backlog of smears already awaiting inspection. The hon. Lady must know that this is a pattern that is occurring all over the country.

There are similar fears about the much-publicised initiatives on breast cancer screening. Experts in that sector have already said—as they have about cervical screening—that the age at which screening begins should be lower. Today the Minister tried to justify why that should not be so. However, on balance I prefer to agree with the experts. We must aim for three-yearly intervals between screenings rather than five yearly. As I have said, I hope that the Under-Secretary will also look carefully at the shortage of specially trained radiologists and surgeons. All those matters cast grave doubts on the quality of that service.

While such doubts and uncertainties remain, thousands of women will continue to die needlessly. Money—the one thing the Government never want to discuss in debates on the National Health Service—is the major answer: money for training, money for more staff, money for laboratories and clinics, and money for further and continuing research. I am sure that the hon. Lady did not intend to delude women into thinking that all is now well with the programmes for cervical and breast cancer screening, but she appeared to suggest that. That would be unfair. Many of the women whom the hon. Lady wants to see screened will not even be called for screening until 1992. Will she tell us how many women will not be called until 1992? I am sure that she does not know the answer. Perhaps it is incalculable.

Mrs. Currie: Perhaps the hon. Lady might do the sums for herself. I said to her that through the screening service we expected to make contact with about 13 million women in this country. We expect to call them in approximately equal tranches over a five-year period. I also said that anyone who has never been called for screening—I have made this point on many occasions—can come in at any time. We tell people that if they are symptomless, there is no need to worry. I am content with that. It would not be possible to call in 13 million in the next six weeks and screen them all at once.

Ms. Richardson: I do not think that the hon. Lady has answered the point. We can all do our calculations. She says that women can come forward at any time if they wish to do so. As the Minister herself has pointed out, women do not always think about the necessity of doing so. Sometimes they do not do so until, unfortunately, it is too late. However, if they did all come forward at the same time, the entire system would snarl up. It would not be possible to cope with all those women because there are not enough laboratory resources or staff to check the smears. Unless more resources are provided, there will be women who would not be called until 1992, and many of them may die in the meantime.

Similarly, family planning services that have contributed so greatly to women's improved health, and again were fought for by women and brought into the National Health Service by a Labour Government—I am proud to say—are being cut. The hon. Lady has said that she would be concerned if the family planning service disappeared or was substantially cut. At least, 25 districts have made cuts in their family planning services already, according to reports from community health councils and family planning regional offices. All the available evidence shows that more districts are planning cuts.

Any Government who were genuinely interested and concerned about this matter would urgently intervene to prevent the inevitable increase in unplanned pregnancies that will result from such policies. Ironically, they will also create long-term increased social and economic costs. It is a short-sighted and narrow approach which plagues every aspect of the Government's policies. The obsession with cash limits, charges and market forces distorts every section of the Government's White Paper on promoting better health. They end up by addressing the wrong agenda and issues and, therefore, come to the wrong conclusions.

The Minister should be chairing an interdepartmental committee covering employment, her Department, housing, the environment and transport. The committee should cover all Departments. It should examine broadly what contributes to bad health in women and in men. The hon. Lady is the appointed Minister for women's health, and we are all glad that the Government have acknowledged that there is a problem and have appointed a Minister to deal with it. That will not be done, however, within the blinkered confines of the Minister's Department. I hope that she and the Prime Minister will recognise the necessity for having an interdepartmental link so that we can examine the problem properly and sanely.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I recommend to my hon. Friend a recent report entitled "Poverty in Lewisham". If the Minister were to chair a committee of the sort that my hon. Friend has suggested, she might find some links that are well illustrated in the report. In three of the wards in my constituency, one in four is unemployed —one in five of the young people is unemployed—and one of every two households is receiving supplementary benefit. My hon. Friend will not be surprised when I say that in two of those wards my constituents are 30 per cent. more likely to be dead before the age of 65 than are those who live elsewhere. In the other ward the figure is 54 per cent. Those figures illustrate that mortality rates are linked directly to poverty, unemployment, bad housing and all the ills that have been illustrated by my hon. Friend.

Ms. Richardson: My hon. Friend, in referring to the borough which she represents, has illustrated what could be done nationwide if the Minister took up my suggestion of an interdepartmental committee. I hope that she will tell us later whether she is intending to take it up.

Labour's agenda for women's health—it has been set out in one of the best documents that the Labour party has ever produced—has been set by women. It was founded on women's own experience and it built on the ideas and the health projects that women have developed for themselves. Together with our proposal for a ministry for women, the agenda will provide the powerful Government machinery that is needed to ensure that every Government Department is included—for example, the Departments of the Environment and Employment, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Departments of Energy and Education and Science, the Treasury and the Department of Health and Social Security. All those Departments should be monitored. A women's ministry and a health Department under a Labour Government will jointly ensure that the social and economic causes of women's ill health are tackled on every front.

If ever there is justification for the concept of a women's ministry, it rests with the problems of women's health and the necessity for monitoring what is happening in every Department. There must be a central strategy for women's health, and that is what the Government do not have. We would ensure under a Labour Government that all women had the same opportunities to make genuine and realisable choices about their own health and the health of their families and communities. That includes private and community health care. We would work together in teams and in partnership to ensure that there is real choice and the best of health for all. That, in our view, is the way forward. That is the only real hope for the future that women have for themselves and for their families.

11.14 am

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on being able to produce the amazing catalogue of measures that the Government are now taking to improve women's health care. She must accept our congratulations on being the Minister who has put the subject on the map. There is no doubt that she whizzes around like an Exocet missile, attacking all areas that might prejudice women and which concern women especially. She is not the only member of the Government, however, who takes a special interest in women's health and general lifestyle. We do not need a Minister to take that special responsibility because we have so many Ministers who take an interest in the subject.

I shall talk especially about mature women and their health care. It is a subject in which I have a special interest, not least because I am one of them. When we are cute little babies, everybody loves us. When we become older and become pregnant mums, everyone cares for us. Who cares for women when they become menopausal? Until recently, not many.

Ms. Harman: Not many men do.

Mrs. Gorman: Perhaps. Women in this age group were often embarrassed and felt guilty. In many instances the approach of others was to this effect, "Well, you are getting old and you must put up with the consequences, just as your mother and grannie did." When the event hit me, as it does every woman eventually if she lives long enough, and I started to experience horrible hot flushes and other symptoms, I went to find treatment. As my hon. Friend the Minister said in her opening remarks, it is true that women tend to put up with a great deal that a man would normally go to his doctor to complain about. I am one of those real women who usually do not put with things. Accordingly, I went to find help, but it was not easy.

I shall refer briefly to some of the awful things that can happen. There are awful hot flushes, which are embarrassing when one is in a room that is full of people. The woman might say "Oh, my God, it is hot in here." Everyone looks round and says, "It is not really. It is you." It is rather like saying to a crowd of strangers, "I am getting old."

My wrists and ankles began to hurt. My ankles became so painful that I could hardly get to the top of my house—incidentally, it has 70 steps. My wrists became so painful that I could not cut a slice of bread. I had to buy sliced bread. Incidentally, I could tell the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) where she could buy good sliced wholemeal bread in Brixton. I drive through Brixton almost every other day and I know where it is possible to buy good wholemeal bread and yoghurt. I am fond of Greek yoghurt. It is possible to buy some good West Indian bread, which is really delicious. It is brown and moist and lasts for ages. I buy it regularly.

As I was saying, I could not cut a loaf of bread because my wrists were so painful. I was running a business and when I returned home at about 7 o'clock I was knocked out, as it were. I was tired, listless, dreary and irritable. Worst of all, I started forgetting things. This meant that I missed appointments. I began to think that if these were the symptoms of becoming old at the age of about 40, I would rather be dead. I felt that I could not face another 30 years of them.

I was fortunate. I am a biologist by training and so I know a little about these things. I went to King's College hospital, which has a menopausal clinic that is one of the most prominent in the world. It is a world leader. I got myself on hormone replacement and it reconstructed me. I am a resurrected woman. I would have fallen to pieces had it not been for the treatment.

When I saw the facilities at King's I realised that the opportunity for women to discover the marvellous treatment that has helped me enormously was scant. There are only about a dozen such clinics in the country. I asked those at King's who had helped me how I could help them. They said that they wanted to raise money for a unit that they could make a national research and development centre, and I started getting a committee together to do this work. In the meantime I was elected to Parliament. That meant that everything came out in the open about me—hormones, the menopause and my age. I decided that I might as well go for broke. I wrote an article for a newspaper that was to this effect, "Yes, I am over 50. Yes, I am menopausal. Yes, I have hormone replacement therapy. Yes, it is terrific." The response was 10,000 letters from women saying that they thanked God that someone was talking about the subject. Some of the letters set out horrific stories of broken marriages and women driving their kids mad because they were so irritable. I realised that there was a desperate, crying need to provide help for women in this position.

Since I have come out, as it were, I have met an enormous number of women who are prepared to admit that they receive hormone replacement treatment. These include Dora Bryan, Dot of EastEnders, Diana Sheridan and many other famous women. I shall not give the House the whole list now. The gynaecologist to the Queen is a big supporter of it. He believes that it can help enormously and is on record as saying so.

My experience has helped to highlight one aspect of women's medicine which was perhaps hidden and secretive, and about which women felt bad. A third of women have these desperately awful symptoms, another third have them fairly badly and some do not have them. One is unfortunate if one's doctor is a woman who has not experienced these symptoms because she will not be sympathetic, nor, I am sad to say, will many general practitioners.

The Minister said that this treatment is available on the Health Service, but that does not mean that a woman will always find a doctor willing to grant it to her. If she does, he may not understand all the nuances. There are about 20 different varieties of hormone involved, like baked beans. She needs a specialist and if her doctor gives her a treatment which does not work or affects her badly, often there is nowhere to go to see a specialist. we need more menopause specialists.

We have 9 million menopausal women, many of whom are suffering symptoms, some of which they can see, such as flushing, but many which go on inside the body insidiously. Outside we may become wrinkly but inside we are growing crumbly. Our bones, arteries and memory are all being affected. There is now masses of evidence, as the Minister pointed out, linking the lack of female hormones which are lost at the menopause with osteoporosis. I am delighted at the support and help that she has given to the National Osteoporosis Society. I am working closely with it and between us we want to set up special places where women can go.

Unseen symptoms include arterial problems. Arteries and veins decay, leading to strokes, which are another aspect of the loss of female hormones. That is being studied at King's College hospital, which also has a unit studying the mental and psychological effects of the loss of hormones. Many women undoubtedly suffer from deep depression and sometimes their doctor gives them tranquillisers or pep pills, which cost a fortune and which the doctor continues to prescribe for donkey's years. They cause side effects. The Minister said that she was not keen on on-going drug treatments over many years. People get hooked on tranquillisers. That is not necessary if more research is done on this subject.

The Minister's answer to osteoporosis is to take more exercise. That may be good advice for those under 40, but there is not much one can do to increase one's bone mass when one is over 40, except perhaps the middle bits. I am assured that the end bits which snap off with wrist and hip fractures are not particularly affected. Incidentally, many people die of jogging.

Some people worry about the side effects of this hormone replacement treatment. Whenever I become enthusiastic about it, which I frequently do, the scare of cancer is raised. We must meet that anxiety and we can probably do more research on that. Many women who have come to our new clinic, which I have helped to open, are discovered to have other conditions when they come in for menopause symptoms. They can then be sent on for other treatments.

Originally, American women with this problem were given only oestrogen. I do not want to get too technical. That hormone causes the lining of the womb to build up and if one does not get rid of it, as one does naturally when one is younger in the form of a period, it can become cancerous. That was not realised early on, but now it has been discovered and women are given a balance of hormones, similarly to those produced when young, so that the lining of the womb is shed periodically. That is good news for the tampon makers. In that way, women do not risk cancer of the uterus. There is a possible link with breast cancer which is under investigation, but by having frequent checks for hormone replacement therapy, women are more likely to be screened and mammogrammed. I go every six months and have a mammogram there. As far as we know, there is no link between the treatment and cervical cancer.

About a third of all Health Service beds, for example in orthopaedic wards, are used by women with problems linked to the menopause. Heart attacks rocket in older women. They are practically unknown in young women because they produce hormones, but when that stops, the rate of heart attacks in women catches up with that in men. Therefore, many menopausal women, for example, with arterial problems or suffering from strokes, are in hospital care. There are 10 women for every man in institutions for the senile because the menopause has a profound effect on one's mental capacity. Women reach the point, sometimes quite young, when they cannot remember how to light the gas stove. That is hard to believe, but it is true. They forget how to do as simple a task as that. We all know about women arrested for shoplifting and blaming it on their age, and often that is to blame. American evidence shows a distinct link between Alzheimer's disease and the loss of hormones, as witnessed by the number of older women, compared with men, suffering from it. That is a further area for research.

In America, this treatment has been used almost since the last war. At least women know about it there, which British women do not. Perhaps a third of American women take this type of help, so it is not a newfangled idea just to keep women young, although there is nothing wrong with that. If we do not have to get old, why bother? The treatment will not make us live for ever. We will go on for our four score years and 10. I say that because many women are living well into their eighties. We are talking about the quality of life. Are we going to be little old ladies, stooped with osteoporosis, having lost five or six inches in our spine and unable to remember what we did two seconds ago, or are we to be in the fantastic condition of someone like the Queen Mother, who is healthy, articulate, intelligent, bright and active?

Mrs. Currie: I was wondering whether my hon. Friend was going to offer herself as an advertisement for the treatment.

Mrs. Gorman: Why not? This treatment is well worth supporting and investigating.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): The hon. Lady is making an interesting and valuable speech, but I am not clear whether she is also advocating that the Government should put more resources into this. If she is, will she be explicit about it?

Mrs. Gorman: I am just coming to that point.

In response to my experience I set up a new charity called the Amarant Trust to raise funds for King's college hospital medical school. It would like to set up a national centre to investigate all aspects of this treatment, to make it as effective as possible, and the various ways of administering the treatment. We certainly applied to the Minister for support and I hope that under section 64 she will consider giving us some help. We need about £2 million for the centre where we should like to retrain doctors because few understand the menopause. It is not a special discipline, but it ought to be. I hope that we will put it on the map, and that doctors in training will be given a special course.

I also hope that we shall persuade more GPs to make such treatment available on the National Health Service. However, I certainly do not exclude the possibility of private sector funds. I should like to see a centre in every town, to which mature women can go without embarrassment to talk to qualified nurses, chat about all their symptoms, be given screening and generally undergo a check-up in a friendly, happy atmosphere. While I hope very much that some of the funds will come from the private sector in co-operation with the Government, who cares where the money comes from so long as the project gets off the ground?

This is one of the most important aspects of medical care—preventive medicine at its best. As some doctors have pointed out, it keeps women out of the orthopaedic wards, the divorce courts and institutions for the senile —I hesitate to use the word "madhouses". Those institutions are unnecessarily filled with women who, if they received more attention, could be prevented from reaching such a condition. We could all end up in our eighties as active, healthy and alert as the Queen Mother.

I am happy that the Government are supporting that kind of preventive medicine, and I hope that they will give it more support.

11.30 am

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): It is a great pleasure to be here this morning, with women Members on both sides of the House, taking part in such an important debate. There are few men present, but those who are here seem a bit embarrassed during part of the speech by the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). I am particularly sorry that the Secretary of State is not present to hear us all speak.

Women's health is not important only to us. It is equally important to our partners, our families, our children and all the people we care for. We must get that point across. I, too, regret that the debate is not taking place in prime time, and that this is not a parliamentary occasion with the Benches packed with the male Members who are in the majority here. Nevertheless, I welcome the debate, and I should like to expand on what was said earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson). We are discussing not merely health but stress, poverty, work and, in particular, the environment —all the issues that promote good health, not just the way in which the National Health Service is used to treat ill health.

The hon. Member for Billericay expressed regret that not enough doctors were prepared to specialise in women's issues. I particularly regret the closure five or six years ago of the South London hospital for women, which was one of the major training grounds for women. We are now beginning to experience the bad effects of that closure. Not many female consultants and medics specialise in the different kinds of women's health care, and that is reflected up and down the country. A report produced last week clearly showed that proportionately very few women make it to the top in medicine.

The Minister said that our health was in our hands. I take issue with that. Some of our health is indeed in our hands, but so many other aspects are in the Government's hands. My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) asked where the money would come from to fund a clinic to help menopausal women, and perhaps to extend the provision to set up well woman clinics all over the country. I do not think that it is enough to say that we do not care where the money comes from. The Government should be providing a lead. An integral part of NHS funding should be the provision of well woman clinics, where women can simply walk in without fear or embarrassment. The reason for a visit may be a means of uncovering all kinds of other illnesses or conditions for which the woman could receive support. That would benefit not only her but her family and her employer.

A range of issues affect women as women. First, family planning services have been cut dramatically. Two thousand unwanted and regretted pregnancies have been occurring every year because clinics are closing down. Women who are no longer able to walk into a clinic and obtain advice have no choice but to go to the local GP, who is often very busy and often male. He may not even be fully trained in contraception, and is more than likely to prescribe the pill as a matter of course—which is the best thing that a doctor can do when he is busy and far too many people are coming to his surgery every morning. There is a clear need for much more direction from the NHS to provide family planning clinics.

Secondly, a woman is likely to have babies at some stage in her life, which brings us to the subject of maternity services. My constituency contains one of the largest maternity hospitals in the country. Recently, I met the midwives who work there, and heard at first hand that, although they have a very good centralised unit—one of the largest in the country—the shortages mean that it is being run on the basis of midwives' good will. There are not enough resources to enable them to provide the full and comprehensive service that they would like to provide.

I did indeed smile when the Minister mentioned her initiatives to encourage more women to breast-feed. But hard-pressed midwives will not be available to advise all the patients who come into the hospital. They cannot tell all the new mothers how important breast feeding is. Short staffing means that it is impossible to provide a continuous service, from the time when a woman first knows of her pregnancy until the time when she gives birth. As the mother of two children, I know that it makes a world of difference for the midwife to be there from the beginning, to be present at the birth and to visit the woman at home afterwards. That gives a new mother the best possible start.

Ms. Harman: Does my hon. Friend agree that solving the shortage of midwives is fairly and squarely the Government's responsibility? Pay is not the only problem. Midwives complain strongly of the inflexibility of their working hours and the lack of child-care facilities. The Government must take action on all those problems.

[Ms. Harman]

Ms. Walley: My hon. Friend has summed up the position admirably. When there are shortages of midwives and other nurses—as we have seen recently in the Birmingham children's hospital—staff must be recruited, but that can only be done if we change the basis of their working conditions, and perhaps enable some of the menopausal women about whom we have just heard to get back into our hospitals and the NHS. That also applies to younger women with children at school. All these issues are vitally important.

I am delighted to see that breast cancer screening services are being set up all over the country. Let me say as an aside, however, that if the Minister is so keen to introduce them and to enlist the help of all hon. Members on both sides of the House, it might have been helpful to receive an invitation to the opening of the one that serves my constituency. I received no such invitation, which is why I was outside with all the other people who are concerned about aspects of NHS funding.

I welcome the introduction of the breast screening services. In Staffordshire the take-up of those services has been beyond our wildest dreams. A 70 per cent. take-up was expected, but the actual take-up was 76 per cent. My main concern is to ensure that, when women have plucked up courage to go for cancer screening, it will be possible to get treatment should they need it, without having to wait a long time. I am concerned that in the west midlands those women who are receiving radiotherapy treatment have to wait a long time for that treatment and as a result suffer great personal hardship.

Cervical cancer screening is incredibly important. Women are unnecessarily dying of that disease. The problems that have been experienced by my district health authority have had to be kept in the public eye. There has been a considerable delay in processing the results of the tests, but I understand that that problem is now more in hand than it was four months ago. That is probably only as a result of the initiatives that have been taken by local hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding).

I was horrified when one of my constituents came to me and said, "My wife has been prescribed some treatment as a result of cervical cancer, but why is it that there is no laser equipment within the North Staffordshire health authority to provide that treatment? My wife must go elsewhere." When I delved deeper into the matter, I discovered that there are some fortunate district health authorities that have laser technology equipment. In many cases, however, that equipment has been bought as a result of private contributions, fund raising or by individuals taking out an overdraft, as in the case of the Sheffield consultant. The marvellous advances that have been made in new technology should be used to treat everyone who needs help. In the debate about the National Health Service and funding, the Secretary of State must face up to the fact that one must take account of new technology. We should ensure that every district health authority has the necessary equipment for treatment.

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Barking, I am delighted that, after campaigning since 1982, we are to have cervical cancer screening in the House. That development only occurred because of the screening that was conducted in the House of Lords, the results of which were so alarming that we managed to finally swing the balance and acquire that service in this House.

The Ceramic and Allied Trades Union, the major union for pottery workers, the headquarters of which are in my area, passed a resolution at a recent conference that it should do everything possible to ensure that a well woman clinic was established in north Staffordshire. On a number of occasions, I have made inquiries of the district health authority about that, but it has said that it does not consider that such a clinic is necessary.

I am sure that CATU members will be delighted that they have the full support of women hon. Members for a well woman clinic. I am sure that even the Minister will exert some pressure to demonstrate the importance of such clinics. If we had such clinics I believe that there would be many more of the "reconstructed women" referred to earlier.

I share the disappointment that the provision of school meals has been cut and the fact that marvellous initiatives, such as the healthy eating initiative adopted by Staffordshire county council, are likely to be affected by competitive tendering and as a result of loss of income due to social security changes.

Last week, a dentist in my constituency told me that Stoke-on-Trent is a black spot for tooth decay. I am sure that those of us who are mothers have, from time to time, had a child screaming with toothache. We must take into account the cuts in the school dental service and the recent charges for dental treatment that have been introduced.

It is marvellous that women are living longer. Many women need community care, and in my constituency that care is not available. Local authorities are hard pressed to find sufficient money within the rate support grant for such care. I make no apology for referring to a constituency interest, Westcliffe hospital, an institution which houses a large number of elderly patients. In the past, I have been assured that, if it is closed down, alternative health provision will be made available. I have been informed that the switchboard of that hospital is likely to be closed down, which will create safety problems for the women in that hospital. With regard to mental health care, it is clear that, as a result of DHA cuts, replacement hospital facilities will not be available.

At the moment there is an important debate about the funding of the National Health Service, about which many of us are concerned. I wish that the Secretary of State had been present today so that he could tell us whether he had had much success in his discussions with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It would be interesting to know the extent of tax cuts that are to be provided for those who take out private insurance at the cost of the services provided by the NHS. Yesterday, I met representatives of North Staffordshire health authority and they asked that I should make an earnest plea to the Government to reconsider the proposed changes to the RAWP formula. As a result of those changes, it will be almost impossible for my area to provide the services that are especially needed for women.

Health care is not in our hands only. It is affected by the money we earn, our housing, working conditions and the environment. Mention was made earlier of a conference on health care, and I believe that different Departments should be represented at that conference. Exercise and sport are important, but why does the Department of the Environment provide insufficient money for local authorities to provide swimming pools and other services to enable women to keep healthy? Why are creches not provided so that women can take part in sport regardless of young children?

Pollution also contributes to ill health. The Government have been dragging their feet on the introduction of lead-free petrol. There are only two garages in my constituency where one can buy such petrol. Three weeks ago I met representatives of The Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders. Its report "Into the '90s" contained not one mention about lead poisoning, lead-free petrol and its effect on children and women. Why has the Department of the Environment not made strong representations on this matter?

Why has the Department of the Environment not intervened on playground safety? The tarmac and concrete used on those playgrounds is dangerous and causes many injuries to young children, with which we mothers must contend. Why is the Department not prepared to put safety first?

Will the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food be invited to the conference? Will it be asked to look at ways in which food policies affect women? Will there be any change in the labelling of foods so that we know what certain foods contain and therefore whether to buy them —presuming that we can afford them?

What steps will the Ministry of Agriculture take to look at the way in which radiation from Chernobyl gets into the food chain? It has become clear in recent weeks that because of water nitrates the water supply in some parts of the country is not safe for young children and babies. Mothers have been supplied with bottled water because the nitrate levels are so high.

Will the Ministry of Defence be asked to make a contribution? RAF Swynnerton is near my constituency, and radioactive substances have been used in exercises. What effect does that have on children's health? I ask that in the wake of the scientific report published earlier this week about the incidence of leukaemia in areas close to Dounreay. What is the Department of Trade and Industry doing about unsafe goods on sale and about the baby walkers that we heard about this morning? Why are there not more prohibition orders on unsafe goods and why is the Department not looking at imports? The Department should be concerned with ballpoint pens whose precise measurement means that if a child swallows a pen top it is likely to choke. We must look at all the issues about product liability and consumer legislation.

Transport has already been covered. Many women cannot live a full life and their mental health is affected because they are confined to the home. Pensioners in Burslem in my constituency cannot get to the health clinic because the bus service stops at a certain hour at night. There are constant complaints from people about such things.

I should like the junior Minister to take on board a few points about women workers. I have had representations about the effects of maternity pay on contractual payments. Some time ago I said how important it was that new mothers should get the best possible start to motherhood. That includes the importance of maternity pay to assist mothers through this difficult although very exciting time. Constituents have told me that because of the way in which maternity pay is assessed, a woman worker sometimes receives perhaps two weeks' holiday pay on the same day, but she may get more than that, or she could end up with 60 per cent. of the amount to which she is entitled. In my constituency, women sometimes get £90 or £67, while other women in the same factory receive perhaps £110. That is wrong. Women need the maternity pay to which they are properly entitled.

One of the things that has saddened me over the last nine years is the reduction in the Health and Safety Executive's ability to enforce good, safe standards of health and safety in the workplace. One of the industrial diseases that is especially prevalent among women pottery workers in my constituency is tenosynovitis. I pay the greatest possible tribute to the wonderful work of women pottery workers. Government Departments need to do more research into this important industrial disease. Why have we not had legislation about ways in which people move and carry things in the workplace? Those issues are important.

I hope that some of the many valuable contributions by hon. Members today will not be lost. This debate will not be left after today because we shall press these matters and bring them to the attention of the public at every possible opportunity.

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I welcome the decision of the Government to allocate to one Minister special responsibilities for women's health. It is quite clear from the debate and from what we know from experience that the topic certainly needs to be spotlighted because it tends to be underestimated and overlooked.

The debate has ranged so widely over the possibilities that might come before the Minister that there is a danger of diluting her activities and those of her Department. It would be wiser if some of the matters discussed could be allocated to the Departments in which they more properly lie and if we could have somebody in each Department to look at matters from the woman's point of view. That might be a more practical way of following up some of the points that have been made.

I should like to turn to those elements that are clearly the responsibility of the Department of Health and Social Security. I warmly welcome the emphasis that is now being placed on preventive medicine. It is not before time, because it has certainly been one of the most neglected aspects of medicine. I was always brought up to believe that prevention was better than cure, and I am glad to see a conversion to this approach and that we are dealing on a far better and more systematic basis than ever before with the various forms of cancer that afflict women.

Men should not be left out of the concept of preventive medicine. It would be wise if we considered the concept of both sexes, although I recognise that there are special women's illnesses that require very special attention.

I hope that women will come forward and co-operate in schemes that are now under way for testing for cervical and breast cancer. May I offer one small word of caution? Several months ago I conducted a mini campaign in my health district to encourage women to come forward for the cervical smear test. I was horrified to discover that although the authorities were ready to welcome them, there was a distinct reluctance on the part of many women to come forward and have the test. There almost seemed to be a suggestion that there was something shameful about doing so or that women were too embarassed to go through the very easy process.

Ms. Harman: Does the hon. Lady think that the Minister's comments that cervical cancer is increased by screwing around increases the reluctance of women to come forward for cervical cancer smears? Does the hon. Lady agree that the comments of the Minister that women should not screw around discourages women from coming forward because they feel a sense of shame?

Miss Fookes: My hon. Friend the Minister has a turn of phrase which is not always the one that I would use, but that is for her to decide.

It is important that women are encouraged to come forward. I made it plain that I had undergone this test, that there was nothing to it and that I would continue to have it regularly in the hope that as a woman in public life I was not simply urging other people to do what I was not prepared to do myself. That is a more effective encouragement.

I do not know whether my experience in my own limited area is common in the country as a whole. My hon. Friend the Minister will know better than I whether there is any widespread reluctance to undergo these tests on the scale that we think is necessary and proper. If my experience is symptomatic the matter needs to be looked at in health education measures and in public discussions.

I think it is correct to say, but perhaps the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, that young girls who engage in very early sexual activity have a statistically greater risk of contracting cervical cancer. If that is so it should be dealt with by health education for the young. It is not a matter of which anyone would immediately think, especially youngsters who have been brought up to think that there is nothing morally or practically wrong—contraception has developed—in engaging in early sexual activity. I look forward to hearing a reply about that from my hon. Friend the Minister.

The newer techniques that have been developed with breast cancer do not involve the drastic amputation that many, perhaps all, women have dreaded and have found so difficult to come to terms with when it happens to them. I am not sure that those newer techniques are always embraced by the medical profession. The Jeannie Campbell appeal, which has contacted all lady Members, has been campaigning for less drastic methods where they are suitable. In a recent letter, the appeal chairman, Peter Hawkins, says:

"I am extremely disturbed by the increasing number of cases being brought to my attention in which breast cancer patients actually have suffered, or have been threatened by, unnecessary breast amputation.

In the majority this has been because the possibility of alternative conservative treatment was never discussed between diagnosis and mastectomy. In an appalling minority the patient was found, after 'automatic' mastectomy wrongly had taken place, never to have had breast cancer in the beginning."

At the end of his letter he expresses his worry about the all-embracing consent form that patients must sign before having an operation. My hon. Friend the Minister should consider quickly, if she has not done so already, the terms of the consent form. There is nothing worse than giving general consent but discovering that the operation has been carried out in a way to which one would never have consented had one been aware of the full implications. If such a thing happened to me, I would be furious and boiling mad. It would be, however, too late and could not be redressed. I urge my hon. Friend to consider that as quickly as possible.

My hon. Friend the Minister did not deal much with stress-related diseases. It is a matter that the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) had in mind when she gave her survey of what may lie behind women's ill health. It is true that many women are subject to much stress because of work, unemployment or family problems. They should never use excessively tranquillisers and sleeping tablets as an updated version of a medieval cure. I hope that the medical profession is far more aware of the dangers of long-term addiction to what appear to be harmless drugs and that it is far more wary of prescribing them.

I was shattered to be told by an organisation called Broadreach House, which operates in the Plymouth area and specialises in drug and general chemical dependency, that it found it more difficult to wean members of both sexes off such drugs than it did to wean people off heroin or the other so-called hard drugs. Unless tranquillisers are used on a short-term basis to deal with a crisis in a woman's life or health, they are worse than what they are supposedly trying to cure. We must be far more wary of prescribing them and we need a health education programme to explain to women the dangers of using them.

On many occasions, women have visited my constituency advice bureau and said, almost as a matter of course, "I am on X, Y or Z" as though it was the most natural thing in the world. The long-term use of those drugs horrified me even before we reached our present point of knowledge about them. We shall have to give urgent attention to that problem. It is easier to give urgent attention to something that directly threatens life, but emergency treatment should be available for those other ailments or stress-related diseases that do not necessary kill but cause many problems.

It is clear that many women suffer stress simply as a result of trying to perform the traditional tasks of being a housewife and mother while holding down a full or part-time job. I know that one suggestion to tackle the problem is the all-embracing creche facilities, nursery classes and the like. I am not against those facilities and I am sure that they have a valuable role to play. A futher solution that could run alongside those facilities, which would ease that burden, would be if women could take time off when their families were young without their employment and promotion prospects being impeded when they return to the market place. We must look far more closely than we have previously at the possibility of returning women to work after a period away from their working environment while they give their first attention to their families.

That may be the prerogative of other Departments, such as the Department of Employment, but I am sure it would not be beyond the powers of my hon. Friend the Minister to interfere, in the kindest possible way, in the activities of other Departments to ensure that they consider the woman's point of view.

It would be useful if medical practitioners and nurses were more aware of how much of a burden women carry in their domestic lives and jobs. I know that it is generally believed that the husband or partner give far more help with the housework than they used to, but my strong hunch is that for every man who does all those saintly duties there are a further nine who do precious little, continue in exactly the way that they always have but expect the women to hold down a job and carry out the domestic duties.

Ms. Richardson: I follow the hon. Lady's argument—and I apologise for being absent from the Chamber for a few minutes—but does she agree that the introduction of the concept of parental leave, whereby both partners would statutorily be allowed to take time off work, would encourage more men to take more interest and responsibility in home care?

Miss Fookes: The theory is good, but what worries me is that it might lead to one more visit to a darts, football or snooker match rather than doing what they should be while on parental leave. Having reached middle life, perhaps I am becoming slightly cynical. In theory, the concept of equal responsibility is all very well. I should like to be proved wrong and find that they might not use the opportunity for something other than for which it was intended.

As a former teacher, I am well aware of the importance of catching people young. It is important not only to have education processes and campaigns for adults but to ensure that those matters are dealt with at school. I know that teachers complain that they are always being asked to add a further item to the overloaded curriculum, but it could be subsumed, if the information were given, in the various subjects by which health education is taught.

I am particularly perturbed about the number of young girls who smoke cigarettes. It is much more difficult to give up the habit than never to start it. I have never smoked a cigarette, but those who do must feel that they are part of a highly threatened minority that is hardly allowed to exist. Even hardened smokers would probably agree, however, that it would be better if youngsters never started to smoke. A much tougher programme is needed to persuade youngsters never to begin the habit.

All the good reasons why young people should not start to smoke will not necessarily work. Young girls are most vulnerable about their appearance. They are usually deeply conscious of it. Health education must be related to how they look rather than to how they will feel or how health they will be in 20, 30, or 40 years' time. It is very easy to make a good case about never starting to smoke by relating it to their appearance.

Several Opposition Members have referred to the fact that women doctors ought to be available for those women who would prefer to see them. Some women are so diffident that they do not even make the point that they would prefer to see a woman doctor. For all those who say that they would prefer to see a woman doctor, I suspect that there are many more women who would greatly appreciate that facility but who would never voice it because they are accustomed to seeing male doctors. The most intimate details are frequently spoken about these days, but I am sure that the great majority of ordinary women are very reticent about doing so. They would find it far easier to talk to a sympathetic woman doctor whom they feel would instinctively understand what they are trying to say. However well intentioned male doctors may be, that is how very many women feel. This is particularly important to women who belong to the ethnic minority groups. It is a deep part of the culture of Asian women that they do not allow a man other than their husband to see or touch them. That may be misguided, but we shall not overcome that cultural opposition overnight. In the meantime, those women deserve as much care as any other women. They deserve the best care that is available. I hope that my hon. friend will look carefully at that aspect.

I am tempted to make a number of further points but I am aware that other hon. Members are anxious to speak in the debate. I hope that the few points that I have referred to will have made my hon. Friend the Minister aware of the fact that, although she has made an excellent start in dealing with the health of women, a great deal more remains to be done.

Mr. Ronnie Fearn (Southport): Despite what was said earlier, I am not in the least embarrassed about being here this morning. Male Members of Parliament have wives and daughters and we speak to one another about these matters. Our constituents occasionally talk to us about them. I am pleased, therefore, to have this opportunity to join in the debate on women's health.

Due to the structure of our society, women play a central role in the health of the nation. They are in a position to influence the health of others and to promote good and preventive health habits in our children. They are the major carers through their role in the Health Service and in the family and the community. That is one reason why their health should be of prime importance to the Government and to this House.

Today, more than ever, women are expected to cope with a diversity of roles, with little or no support. More women work today than ever before—some out of choice, others because of the pressures of a materialistic and consumer society, and many out of pure need. Most are in low paid and low satisfaction work. Few are in positions of power or influence. At the same time we expect them to provide a good family life and to care for our children, the sick and the elderly.

In the poorer sections of the community, these pressures are added to by intolerable housing and living conditions. We hear a lot about Victorian values. In many respects this Government have reintroduced Victorian legislation for the social services and the welfare state. However, it is time that we recognised that the structure of society is not what it was. Gone is the extended family and the close-knit community that could offer help and relief from the pressures of caring for children, the sick and the elderly. Today our carers are often isolated and expected to cope on their own. I do not find it surprising that women suffer from the effects of stress, anxiety and depression. It is time that we cared for the carers.

With the emphasis on community care, it is important that we should replace the old network with a full range of community services. There should be adequate day care facilities, creches, mobile clinics, day centres, home helps and visits and short-term respite facilities. There should also be improved benefits to relieve the financial burden that is often placed on our carers. With an improvement in these services, it may be easier for men to take on the role of carers, thereby giving women the freedom of choice that they should have.

[Mr. Ronnie Fearn]

It is with some concern that I note that district health authorities are finding it necessary to close down their family planning clinics in budget-saving exercises. Family planning clinics offer a wider choice of contraceptives. The staff are often better trained in these matters than the general practitioner and can offer more time for consultations than the average GP. It has already been said twice that many women prefer to go to clinics. Quite often, it is the only opportunity that they have to be seen by a woman doctor. Family planning clinics have proved to be cost-effective and we should consider expanding, not diminishing their number.

I welcome the Under-Secretary of State's claim in a speech to the Royal College of Nursing on 19 May 1988 that the Government do not want health authorities to cut back on the provision of family planning clinics. While district authorities continue to suffer from a shortage of funds, the position is unlikely to improve.

We hear much from the Government about freedom of choice. Many of their policies are justified by that cry, yet the centralisation and rationalisation programme in the hospital service and the cuts due to the financial crisis have limited the choice for many women. For instance, it is often the maternity wings of hospitals that are hit. Expectant mothers find that the criterion of choice becomes not the services provided but how far and for how long they will have to travel to reach a hospital.

The centralised programme is sometimes justified by the claim that health authorities are providing centres of excellence, equipped with all the latest advances in technology and equipment. When that claim is applied to obstetrics, we are in danger of pressurising women into giving birth in unnatural clinical surroundings and, in the majority of cases, with unnecessary technical equipment. The Government are on record as saying that their aim is to encourage hospital births in order to reduce the mortality rate, yet there is no confirmed evidence to support the theory that the fall in the mortality rate is due to hospital confinements. Hospitals have a far higher rate of infection of the mother than have home births. There needs to be more scientific evaluation of present methods before we continue to pressure women into high-tech births.

The real choice for women will come when we view pregnancy and birth as the natural phenomena that they are. We should provide the maternity services that the World Health Organisation recommends. The expectant mother must be given the opportunity, in consultation with her doctor and midwife, to choose the birth that suits her best. Therefore, the number of midwives needs to be increased and after-care services expanded.

That latter point is particularly important, because, as a result of financial and staffing pressures, more and more women are being sent home 24 hours after giving birth. The latest information from the Royal College of Midwives is that, between 1979 and 1987, the birth rate increased by a further 40,000 babies, but the claim that more midwives are being employed could be challenged and the Royal College of Midwives says that we are talking about only half a midwife per unit per week.

Later in life, many women have to suffer the effects of the menopause without any hope of alleviation of the symptoms of menopause-related diseases such as osteoporosis, which is connected with the death of many older women. In June 1986, the Nursing Times and Nursing Mirror estimated that osteoperosis treatment was costing the Health Service £2 million per week, with a third of hospital beds occupied by women suffering from related ailments. We have heard with interest about hormone replacement therapy, which may offer women a better quality of life. However, before it becomes commonplace, there should be a further investigation of the short and long-term effects of such treatments, and more information and training should be given in methods of prescribing it.

The current financial crisis and long waiting lists mean that many women needlessly suffer the pain and discomfort of osteoarthritis and other conditions. Yet we hear of more ward closures and of a doctor in Sheffield contributing a third of his salary to keep his specialist osteoporosis unit for another two months. In the majority of areas, provision is not good enough. In Southport, we are lucky: a new hospital is due to open at the end of the year, although there again, it is to replace outdated buildings.

Four major causes of death in women have been identified as coronary disease, lung cancer, breast cancer, and cervical cancer. The last two are specific to women and I welcome the Government's attempt to improve matters through screening programmes. However, those programmes will not be completely successful unless the Government also provide and fully fund the necessary back-up services. I note with concern that units that began their programmes in January are already having to close because of a shortage of scientific and laboratory staff. With increased emphasis on preventive screening and new laboratory techniques it is imperative that the Government tackle the problem by improving and funding pay awards and improving career structures in the service.

The mammography programme requires a better training scheme for radiologists to prevent unnecessary recalls, and possibly the employment of specialist teams to ensure that the correct diagnosis is made and the correct treatment given. Both screening programmes should involve more counselling and after-care services for women who are proved positive.

Perhaps most important of all, the hospital services must be given the means to provide the treatment necessary. There is little point in introducing systems of early detection if treatment is thwarted by lack of equipment, lack of staff, and long waiting lists. There is also a danger that in the current crisis, less serious gynaecological cases will be pushed further down the list, with the result that more women will suffer months, if not years, of ill health, perhaps with more serious consequences.

The Governnment must look at the whole picture. Women play a pivotal role in our society. In an ideal world, men would share that role, but until the structures of our society are changed to accommodate that, it is especially important that women are given the local, community and work-based services that they require to meet the demands that society and Government place on them. The better health that women enjoy, the more benefit will accrue to us all.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): I declare an interest as a director of the Churchill Clinic, which is in the private sector. I very much welcome this first Government debate on women's health. The Minister, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and others have alluded to the fact that not only is our total Health Service of vital national importance but it affects women more than men both because they live longer and because they have special roles such as childbirth, child care, and so on. They also have the role of educating children. As I hope to illustrate, preventive medicine is a key aspect. The debate is particularly timely and I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in it.

The National Health Service is about 40 years old and it is in a crisis of change. It has been alleged that the Government do not care and that they have instituted cuts. I find such allegations amazing. When I read Government statements or listen to Ministers, as I have over the past nine years, I find it hard to see how allegations of not caring could be justified. One type of caring is to give money away; the other is to ensure that that money is properly spent and that it genuinely goes to those who need it. That is effective care.

Let me deal with the allegation of cuts. Spending on the Health Service increased from £7.5 billion in 1979 to £22 billion this year. That is an amazing increase—30 per cent. and more ahead of inflation. Opposition Members' claims are therefore difficult to substantiate.

It is interesting to note that as more money has been spent on the National Health Service in vast amounts, so the complaints have increased. The complaints reached a crescendo last winter, which makes it obvious to me that the problem is not one of money and that we need to look somewhere else for the cause. Therefore, I greatly admired the Government's courage in not responding to the crescendo of complaint by pouring more money into what is effectively a leaking bucket. Instead, they decided to spend on a maintenance basis and conduct a top-level review to establish, on behalf of every citizen in the country, where the taxpayers' money must go to ensure that in the next 40 years the Health Service will still work, and work to the benefit of the nation as a whole.

As we all know, health is a complex problem. As has been said by the Minister and others, more people live for longer. As they live longer, more complex demands are placed on the Health Service. Furthermore, expectations have changed. When I was a lad, for the symptoms of many ailments one readily accepted a glass of hot milk and two aspirins and the recommendation that one should go to bed. Today people expect more sophisticated treatment, or at least more sophisticated consultation, for the same symptoms.

Technology has improved, and that is greatly to our advantage. But that has happened at a price far in excess of inflation. There is a technology expenditure curve, in addition to an inflation curve. Furthermore, high technology operations place much greater demands on the resources of the Health Service.

Technology has enabled operations such as kidney transplants, which were unheard of 30 or even 20 years ago, to become routine. They are very demanding on Health Service resources and there are huge opportunity costs. If kidney transplants are to be carried out, what operations will need to be stopped? What is the opportunity cost? There is also a greatly increased awareness of new types of disease such as stress, which has already been mentioned this morning. That all leads to increased demands on the Health Service.

Somewhat misguided comments have been made today about alcoholism and so on being directly related to unemployment. My county of Hampshire has recently been told that it has the worst record in the country for violence against the police. There were 34 cases last year, 90 per cent. of which were alcohol-related. Yet Hampshire is not an area of high unemployment—indeed, it has low unemployment and high earnings per head. Therefore, we cannot simply and justifiably relate stress to high unemployment.

The good health of the nation is absolutely essential to our survival as a developed nation. However, it is not just a question of money—although funding is, of course, a critical problem. I hope that, in their current top-level review the Government will turn heavily towards preventive medicine. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for not having given her notice, but I would be interested to know how much of the NHS budget is spent on preventive medicine. Even without knowing the figure, I guess that it is not enough. In that top-level review, preventive medicine must be seen as a massive source of cost saving. Government spending on preventive medicine should be seen as an investment in the future to reduce potential costs and claims on the NHS. Just as with buildings, to modernise, maintain and take preventive action is a good philosophy.

I support the Government's aim of increasing the emphasis on self-reliance, and women can play an influential and important role in that. However, the Government must also play a key role in preventive medicine. First, they must regulate on matters such as pollution. Secondly, they must provide preventive services such as screening, and thirdly, they must publicise much more widely the good programmes that they are following, such as immunisation, and educate on such matters as diet.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has done a tremendous amount in that area and I much admire her courage in challenging even the sanctity of the English breakfast and other dishes that are thought to be sacred. That took guts. She had to take a great deal of flak following some of her comments. The Government's first role in preventive medicine should include action on pollution, especially passive smoking and leaded petrol. Secondly, there should be action on what I call lifestyle —diet, alcohol and active smoking. The third area is in services such as immunisation and screening.

The recent Froggatt report shows conclusively that passive smoking alone—and I am not yet speaking of active smoking—increases the incidence of lung cancer by between 10 and 30 per cent. That is an enormous figure. Think of how many people are suffering and using the resources of the Health Service because of lung cancer predominantly caused by smoking.

When I spoke in the Chamber on 9 May 1980 during a smoking and health debate, I said:

> "I believe that the Government should consider legislation on non-smoking areas, particularly enclosed, confined public spaces, such as lifts, cinemas, waiting rooms and, indeed, the Committee Rooms and Dining Room of this House—a place where we are fortunate to have a specific Smoking Room set aside."—[Official Report, 9 May 1980; Vol. 984, c. 714.]

[Mr. John Browne]

I was almost laughed out of the Chamber for saying that. I am glad to say that, today, I think the story would be very different. Indeed, there is now an early-day motion along those lines.

Subsequent early-day motions have stated that we should not have such a tyranny of restricting smoking.

The Government must take strong action. Obviously,people have a right to smoke—I am not trying to take away that right—but the Government's duty is to defend a far more basic right than the right to smoke, and that is the right of the non-smoker to breathe fresh air. The Government have not grasped that nettle firmly enough. Leaving it to the free market is not enough. Every day people are unnecessarily being caused mortal injury. More legislative action should be taken, and the voluntary codes and so on should be toughened up. I realise that the Government believe in the free market, but legislation can hasten the free market. We have seen that done in many areas.

I now refer to leaded petrol. As we know, there are approximately 18 million cars in the United Kingdom. Two million motor cars, without any adaptation, could use unleaded petrol. Another 7 million cars, with the smallest adjustment to their ignition timing, could immediately take unleaded petrol. In fact, as a demonstration, James Bond's Aston-Martin was converted in 25 seconds. It is not an expensive deal. Most garages could do it for free. If they charged £1, they would get a lot of money for it. So, today nine million cars or 50 per cent. of the cars on our roads—could run on unleaded fuel. Actually, the consumption of unleaded petrol, despite the fact that it is 6p a gallon cheaper than leaded petrol—thanks to the Chancellor—is less than 1 per cent. of petrol sales in this country. Again, the Government must invest more money in publicity to put the message across.

I now refer to what I call lifestyle—food, alcohol and tobacco. Cholesterol and calorie intake has been proved of great significance and importance to health. The Minister has done a tremendous job in highlighting that. I am pleased to hear about the new consultancy on breast feeding. Breast feeding and early feeding habits of children are an aspect of foods. That is why women's role is so important. Breast feeding can affect people's metabolism for the rest of their lives. They become fat-inclined or not fat-inclined, sweet-toothed or not sweet-toothed, and so on. Such matters must be drummed home and money must be spent in terms of investment by the Government. Much more publicity is needed about diet. In terms of legislation, the Government should demand that calorie and cholesterol contents should be printed on food packages at point of sale.

In terms of alcohol—you will be shocked, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by the statistics that I hope to give—750,000 Britons are seriously ill as a result of alcohol abuse. That means that 2 million or more families are affected. Alcohol abuse is the United Kingdom's third most dangerous disease. Women are particularly prone to the harm of excessive alcohol intake, especially in the 25 to 37 age group. Excessive drinking was involved in 80 per cent. of deaths by fire, 40 per cent. of pedestrian traffic accidents, 33 per cent. of child abuse cases, 50 per cent. of murders, 30 per cent. of non-traffic accident deaths, and 33 per cent. of domestic accidents.

As I have said already, I am ashamed that, in Hampshire, we have experienced the worst rise in violence against the police. It occurs throughout the country, and it is rising at an alarming degree. Ninety per cent. of such offences are related to alcohol.

In the past 20 years, alcohol consumption has doubled, not declined. In 1982, £12·3 billion was spent on alcohol. No less than 38p of every leisure pound is spent on alcohol. That is more than is spent on food, light, newspapers, cigarettes, books or holidays. Alcohol has a high human cost—it is responsible for between 5,000 and 10,000 premature deaths each year, and for more than one in five patients being in NHS care. The monetary cost of alcohol misuse is estimated to be more than £1 billion in lost production and more than £1·7 billion in social costs.

The cost is huge. The Government have a duty to publicise that fact far more effectively. We have hard-hitting campaigns, which I support, on AIDS, for example, but the campaign on alcohol is nowhere near hard-hitting enough. Not enough money is spent on it. Will the Government seriously consider demanding through legislation that a health warning be printed on each bottle of alcohol? A label could be affixed, just as a duty-free label is attached. That would not be too expensive and it could be done quickly.

Mrs. [illegible]: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be cheaper for the public purse if we restricted the amount of money spent by alcohol producers on promoting their products? If we did that, we might not need to spend public money combating their advertising.

Mr. Browne: I have some sympathy with that line, but I am more of a free marketeer than the hon. Lady. There are methods other than restricting producers, which I shall describe later. I believe that we should go for the advertisers and prohibit what can be advertised. That would have an immediate effect on what is spent on advertising.

The active smoking of tobacco is a major cause of lung cancer, heart disease and cervical cancer. It is estimated that smoking costs the NHS £500 million a year and that it causes more than 300 deaths a day. We have had pretty good results since 1979. Deaths from lung cancer have declined by 9 per cent., but among women have risen by more than 20 per cent. especially among women in their 20s. Girls aged between 11 and 15 now smoke nearly twice as much as boys of the same age. Smoking is a killer. I support the Government health warnings, but they are not enough. They are not hard-hitting enough. The Government must spend a lot more money to publicise the dangers of smoking. Alcohol and tobacco are killers and they require legislative action.

I am a director of a satellite television company. We have a self-denying ordinance—we will not accept any advertising of tobacco or alcohol products. That has an opportunity cost for us. We do it as a self-initiative, but I believe that the Government should prohibit advertising of tobacco and alcohol products on television, which is such an influential medium.

The Government have done a tremendous job on immunisation. The figures speak for themselves. There is now a 68 per cent. take-up of the vaccination for whooping cough, whereas it was only 31 per cent. in 1978, and there is now a 71 per cent. take-up of the measles vaccination, whereas it was only 48 per cent. in 1978. There is more to be done, however, and I welcome the introduction this October of the combined, measles, mumps and rubella vaccination. This is probably the biggest change for 20 years. However, when I look at the grant of £48,000 that the Government have given to the Rubella Council, I think that that illustrates the problem. When one looks at the cost to the National Health Service of £22 billion, the £48,000 shrinks into an insignificance that it does not deserve.

On the subject of screening, particularly for cancer of the cervix and breast, we know that early detection is critical in successfully treating many of these cancers. We have about 2,000 deaths a year from cervical cancer. The screening that has already been carried out is estimated to have saved about 14 per cent. of those under threat. However, the new five-year screening programme that my hon. Friend has announced is estimated to save 84 per cent. of those who are screened. It is, therefore, a very laudable scheme that has been introduced. It is the first fully comprehensive programme in the world. I believe that the Government should be praised for taking this initiative last February particularly by extending the programme to cover women from 20 years of age. I wholly support that. It is all good stuff. Obviously, as it is a trendsetter for the world, we can expect problems, because we are on the cutting edge.

I have to say—my hon. Friend has already mentioned it in her speech—that we have a problem in Winchester and in Basingstoke, because our district health authorities are situated in areas where competing earnings are very high, the cost of housing is very high, and the payment given to those laboratory technicians—people with two A-levels and six months' training—of £7,000 a year is not enough. They are not striking, as they would have done several years ago, but they are getting on their bikes and moving to other employment and to other agencies. Therefore, what has happened is that Winchester and Basingstoke health authorities do not have the laboratory technicians sufficient to support this excellent initiative. Something has to be done, because women in my constituency are now being re-exposed to the risks that existed before the Government took those initiatives. As my hon. Friend has said, I believe that there are 75 per cent. of other laboratories that are under-utilised. The problem is that Winchester local health authority does not know this. It does not know which those under-utilised health authorities are, so how can it send its smears to them?

Mrs. Currie: It does now.

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend says that it does now, and I am very pleased to hear that. One alternative is to send them into the private sector.

The other idea I must mention to my hon. Friend is that of local pay premiums. Our problem is only the tip of the iceberg. There are people on the clerical staff in our family practitioner units, starting as VDU operators, who earn £4,200 a year; while British Telecom in the same area pay £6,000 a year; local government £5,500; and the Civil Service £6,000. Effectively, the FPC is becoming a training ground for other people. They train and then move on to higher salaries.

The Government have to look at the private sector, for examples. In the private sector, I understand that in Winchester the National Westminster bank, after someone has been on probation for four months, pay a £750 a year premium on their salary. I believe that the Government have to look at this in terms of the National Health Service and regional pay. As a result, Hampshire FPC is short of 25 people from a staff of 115. It is just under 25 per cent. understaffed. Unless this is sorted out, the system will collapse. It is an excellent system and highly efficient. The administrative charges are less than 1 per cent.

Our FPC is a very effective system and yet it is in danger of collapsing because of the low pay of certain of the staff. I think that the Government must examine it and consider stopping capital spending, maybe for a year, in order to put these wages right. They must regrade staff and pay regional cost-of-living premiums. As I have said, if it is not put right there will be a collapse of the cervical screening system let alone the breast screening system that we hope is to come. It will just not get off the ground unless collective action is taken.

To close, I believe that preventive medicine is absolutely essential. It is very cost-effective. The Government must legislate on smoking in enclosed public places. They must legislate on alcohol to get a health warning on bottles. They must legislate to curb advertising of alcoholic and tobacco products, particularly on television. I think that they also must also ensure that there is legislation to require that cholesterol and calorie values are printed on packs at point of sale.

As I have said many times, I think that the Goverment must spend much more on publicising both their own good works, such as immunisation and so on, and the whole concept of self-reliance and what people, particularly mothers, can do in this education process of preventive medicine. I know that the Minister, as I have said before, has already done a great job. I am sure that she will continue. She has shown great courage and I wish her good luck in this very challenging and exciting venture.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I ask hon. Members to keep at least one eye on the clock. There are at least five hon. Members who have been in the Chamber throughout the debate who are hoping to contribute to it. I am sure that we would all be disappointed if they were unable to do so.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I have a train to catch, so I shall not be too long, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I rise with some trepidation as a woman from the north, a category with which the Minister has not been too pleased. Women from the north have suffered some abuse of the past few years. I hope that the guilt that many women in the north have had laid upon them will not emerge in any way in my speech. I try not to behave in that way. As I have said, I rose with some trepidation.

One of the issues on which the Minister and I have corresponded on several occasions has been covered already in the debate, so I shall try to be brief about it. Cervical screening in my area is an issue that has been brought to my attention on numerous occasions. I have frequently found that the Minister's loose talk does not help. I ask her to examine again some of the reasons why women suffer from this form of cancer. I ask her to take on board the fact that there is a reason to which she has not alluded.

The incidence of cervical cancer is not necessarily because women have a number of partners. There are women who have a partner with whom they sleep who has a job which is normally classified as dirty—in coalmining or the steel industry, for example. The incidence of cervical cancer in areas where these occupations predominate is higher than elsewhere in the country. I assure the Minister that I and others are convinced that that is the major reason for the incidence of cervical cancer in my area.

As there are no longer any coalmines or steelworks in my constituency, the world may begin to change. Women in my constituency have been working hard to organise and improve the services that are available, and it is not exactly helpful to tell them that they suffer for the reason that the Minister has given. That does not encourage them to continue to strive for better services.

I ask the Minister to examine the priority age for screening. There seems to be evidence that more attention should be paid to it for those in a younger age group. I accept what she has said about breast cancer screening, but I do not think that that is true of cervical cancer screening. What is the cost of putting work out to private clinics?

Last year I wrote to the Minister about a particular case. A friend of mine was screened in November and did not hear until the end of March that she had had a positive test. It is exactly a year ago this week—I remember it well, because it was the week of the general election—that she eventually had an appointment at the clinic to have her condition dealt with. It was well into August before she knew that she was clear. It is not enough just to stand here and say that that is appalling. The effect of that on women is devastating. My friend was a nurse, but that did not seem to help her. It was a devastating experience, and she was almost agoraphobic. She managed to continue to work, but little else. It has had a devastating effect on her confidence in having tests and on her future life.

I was interested in what the Minister said about the rate of screening and the Government's objectives. In 1986, we knew that 60 per cent. of women with cervical cancer had never been screened. We know that elsewhere there is an effective screening programme which reaches 80 per cent. of all eligible women. At that stage, we could not say what percentage of women was reached by our programme, and I should be interested to know what progress has been made on that.

I was interested in the speech of the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne). He represents a town which in a league table drawn up by a local northern university is shown to be the most prosperous town in Britain. That same table puts Consett, a town in my constituency, at the bottom. The problems that the hon. Gentleman identified in recruiting medical laboratory scientific officers are exactly the same in my constituency. We have enormous problems, particularly because of salary scales, so they are not just created by success and a high wage economy. Consett is at the bottom of the league table because, despite new jobs, we are a low-wage economy. Even then, it is incredibly difficult to recruit MLSOs in the area.

In a recent letter, the chair of the Northern Regional health authority states of north-west Durham:

"Latterly the service has been affected by staff illness and this resulted in a reporting delay of around ten weeks by the end of December 1987, but again by the use of a private laboratory that interval is now down to around six weeks."

He tells me that, in the other district health authority that covers my constituency, the same sort of problems exist.

I know, partly because I was chair of the union which recruits MLSOs, that the recruiting problem in both areas was acute, as was the difficulty of retaining them. They feel that they are not recognised as part of a health care team, that their work and contribution is devalued, and that that is reflected in their salary. Everyone who works in the Health Service has a vital role to play. To see the whole work force as a health care team is crucial if we are to get our preventive health care and responses right. Some health care workers feel not only that their contribution has been devalued, but that they are played off against workers whom the Government see as the hands-on, face-to-face workers. In fact, the contribution of the other workers is equally important. I am not saying that the work of nurses and doctors is not important; of course it is. Others, however, have a vital role to play, and we look to the Government to recognise that.

How do we enable and encourage more women to know, and be confident in, their health services? One of my local community health councils recently carried out a detailed survey, which found that the most disturbing fact about cancer screening was that some 27·6 per cent. of those tested were never informed of the results. The majority presumably assumed that no news was good news, but for some, as I have said, that was very much the wrong assumption.

The survey also discovered that many women did not know or feel confident about finding out when and where to go. Working with women's health projects in the Tyneside area, I found that they were largely able to overcome the problem, vitally affecting the number of self-referrals. The atmosphere and the campaigning nature of the clinics gave women confidence, as they knew that they could go along, meet some of their friends and be dealt with by a woman who would not only do a test but talk to them, listen to their problems and ensure that there was a comprehensive response.

Another group who have been to see me, and who are very distressed about what they see as a breakdown in the service, are the community nurses. Those in one patch of my constituency say that exactly the same number of staff as 10 years ago deal with a caseload 70 per cent. higher. Given that sort of increased pressure on community nurses and on those who try to provide a more holistic approach to health care, is it any wonder that women feel unsure about where to go and what to do? It is partly because they do not want to put additional stress on those whom they know are already overstretched.

Whatever label is attached to the service—well woman clinics, or community health care—I think that the Minister knows what we are talking about. I hope that she will work carefully to ensure that opportunities are provided, particularly in areas in which health care is especially important, because the figures show women to be at higher risk. Cuts in the number of well woman clinics, and the reduction in spending on health education, are not what I see as a positive commitment to support.

I should like to mention many other matters, but I shall be brief. The community nursing problem affects specific issues, which the Minister mentioned and which I had meant to say something about—mental health. Community nurses have a crucial impact on that problem, and I hope that the Government will take it on. Let me also stress the importance of an effective occupational health service. There are now many more women at work; many more now have to work. There is clear evidence from Sheffield that an effective occupational health service improves not just attendance and sickness rates, but the general well-being of employees—and therefore I trust, that of employers. Moreover, it has increased productivity. The International Labour Organisation has suggested how specifically to encourage the development of a good occupational health service.

There are many other issues on the agenda and I believe that the Government know what they are. I press the Government not to lecture women about what they are not doing properly, but to ensure that women can meet their health worries and those of their families.

I remember when I spoke to one of the Minister's colleagues in the canteen downstairs. I noticed that he was having an extremely unhealthy lunch with lots of chips and other fried things. I said that a member of his Government would not be happy about that and he replied, "The trouble is that every time I hear her, it pushes me to have more chips." The Minister should learn from that. Lecturing people about what they should do frequently pushes them the other way.

The Government need to encourage and support good practices, and I accept that I must also do that. The Government must consider first how to give women positive support and encouragement rather than just lectures.

1.5 pm

Mrs. Gillian Shephard (Norfolk, South-West): I am glad to have the opportunity to take part in this debate and equally glad that it is taking place in this Chamber, which focuses all too infrequently on matters of exclusive concern to women. I congratulate the Minister on initiating this debate.

I should like to focus—perhaps more narrowly than other hon. Members—upon the current issues of cancer screening and well woman clinics. I should also like to mention the traditionally included specialisms of maternity and family planning and broader issues that are of particular interest to those who are practically involved in Health Service work—the way in which services that benefit women are delivered and health promotion and education specifically geared to women.

Funding is not the most important element in the successful promotion of women's health, but the way in which available funds are used is important. I am concerned about the effect that local professional enthusiasm may have either positively or negatively on the way in which women's health is regarded.

There should be a combination of Government initiatives and good work at local level, which stems from the health authorities or family practitioner committees as well as the involvement of other relevant local statutory and voluntary agencies. Obviously women must accept that their health is as important as the health of their families and they must accept that responsibility. The private sector must be involved, but most importantly, there must be professional enthusiasm for the cause.

It is useful to consider what has been done by the Government to promote women's health. Obviously the Government can act not only by directly funding their own initiatives, but by pump-priming and initiating others' efforts. The most recent Government-funded initiative—it has had considerable airing this morning—has been the introduction of computerised call and recall systems for cervical cancer testing and the imminent introduction of mammography services. The introduction of the computerised cervical cancer testing system cost £10 million and involved an enormous amount of effort by Health Service staff to computerise many millions of manual records. When we last discussed the system during the passage of the Health and Medicines Bill, some hon. Members, notably Opposition Members, expressed their concern about the way in which the scheme was falling short. To redress the balance, I should like to illustrate the successful way in which that system is operating to serve the health authorities of my constituency.

In the area served by the Norfolk family practitioner committee as a whole, we had our computerised system of call and recall up and running by September, seven months before the Government deadline. The West Norfolk and Wisbech health authority has since January had a system of recall every three years for all women between the ages of 18 and 66, and of call every three years for all women between 35 and 66. The laboratory turn around is four weeks.

The Norwich health authority also serves part of north-west Norfolk, and its recall operates for women between the ages of 20 and 34 every three years. For women between the ages of 35 and 66, it operates every five years, and the call operates for women between 35 and 66 every five years. The laboratory turn around is just over four weeks despite the enormous increase in the amount of work with which the laboratories have had to deal.

While these authorities offer three-year periods of call, they are correctly concentrating their major efforts on getting an increased response to first-time call-out which in East Anglia as a whole is presently 40 per cent. That is not yet good enough, but there is a very good proportion of older women.

Ms. Ruddock: We all applaud the situation that the hon. Lady is outlining. The health authority in my area has been able to get that kind of system going. But a problem arises after the first laboratory turn around time of four weeks when there is an abnormal smear recording and women have to return. There are then enormous delays. Women have an abnormal smear and do not know what is wrong. That is because of the lack of colposcopy services. Perhaps the hon. Lady will tell the House about the colposcopy service in her health authority.

Mrs. Shephard: I shall be delighted to do that. In the West Norfolk and Wisbech health authority there is no problem. There has been some delay in the Norwich health authority but a colposcopy service is being instituted with the help of the voluntary sector. That will be instituted shortly in the Norwich health authority and that will reduce the problem. The problem is nothing like as extreme as that which the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) described in her health authority.

These health districts have responded very positively to Government plans for mammography. The West Norfolk and Wisbech health authority is not the best known in the world, but since January it has been providing a mammography service for women between 50 and 64 on four evenings a week and on Saturday mornings. It is on a self-referral basis and geared to suit the hours when women are free to go along. Since January, 500 women have been examined and in some cases that has resulted in the saving of life.

The Government can be involved in ways other than the funding initiatives of which I have given examples. Sometimes they can achieve as much by pump-priming, an example of which was the £100,000 announced at the start of European Cancer Week. That will clearly help women's health causes in the broader sense. Sometimes Government can help by encouraging effort by others. An interesting example of this approach was described by the Minister in connection with the breast-feeding initiative. The Government deserve to be congratulated on bringing forward cancer screening. That has put the United Kingdom ahead of the rest of our European partners. The Government are also to be congratulated on taking the whole issue seriously and for raising the national consciousness about it.

As important as Government initiatives is the degree of professional enthusiasm for the cause at local level. There is no advantage in the Government insisting that women's health is important if those running local health services do not agree and do nothing about it. I am struck by the contrast between the achievements of the two health authorities that I have mentioned, which serve my constituency, and the problems described during the passage of the Health and Medicines Bill. Although East Anglia is a RAWP receiving region, it is still several percentage points below its full allocation.

I hope that no hon. Member will suggest that south-west Norfolk is somehow part of the palmy middle class south-eastern part of the United Kingdom, because it certainly is not. As well as the problems of sparsity of rural services that are costly to run, parts of it are submerged by water for three months of the year, which makes the delivery of services a challenge that is not commonly met elsewhere—I suggest not in inner cities.

The reason for west Norfolk's success is that for some years there has been a ready acceptance at professional level—at doctors' level—that women's health is important. A well woman clinic has been running at two centres in my constituency for years. When cancer-screening services were introduced, the professionals led the way, the Government provided the money and the political and administrative will followed.

When we tried to introduce a well woman clinic in Norwich, we met with less success. There is one there now, but there was resistance from the serried ranks of male GPs, backed up by male consultants, all of whom said plaintively, "If a woman has something to say, surely she can say it to me. I am always sympathetic." That encapsulates one of the problems with women's health. It is vital that there should be professional enthusiasm and commitment to the cause.

It is important that all professional and voluntary bodies should be involved when a cancer-screening initiative is launched. Any local initiative must reach women more effectively through GPs and dental surgeries, health centres, hospitals, schools, playgroups, voluntary organisations, women's organisations and the private sector than any national campaign, however well organised it is. Women need to know that the service is available, free and painless. An envelope dropping on to a doormat, backed up by extensive local publicity and all the relevant agencies, must be the right way forward.

I mentioned earlier the broader issue of the delivery of services, which in a rural area is vital. The Norwich health district has an excellent scheme of community care groups, which involves a range of health professionals attached to doctors' surgeries or groups of surgeries. Early incidence of forms of mental health that affect women, such as post-natal depression, is picked up by a range of health professionals.

Mention was made of carers, almost uniquely a women's group. Recently, one of our community care groups decided that more emphasis needed to be placed on the services available for carers. A meeting was arranged by the health educator. She involved the local youth and community services and provided a sitting service so that carers could attend the meeting. The Women's Royal Voluntary Service organised the transport and, as the meeting was held in a school, the local parent-teacher association provided refreshment. Information was given by the DHSS, voluntary organisations and Health Service staff. We must have such team work if we are effectively to deliver those services to women where it matters—close to their homes.

Much importance must be attached to the local promotion of cancer-screening services. If health education is to run effectively, it must involve all agencies and, where appropriate, the private sector. Large companies such as Tesco and Sainsbury concentrate on healthy lifestyles.

Health education is almost more important for women than men. Clearly, the advice that is taken on board by women is absorbed for the benefit of their families. In that regard, I am glad that the producer of a certain sunflower margarine has withdrawn the suggestion, which it extensively promoted in a former advertising campaign, that it was more important to keep one's man healthy than oneself. I note that Flora is now thought to be good for everyone, not just for men.

For the information of the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson), I live in Lambeth. I have no problem in obtaining cheap, healthy food at my local Sainsbury, Tesco or Bejam. Local competition provides a wonderful baked bean that is much cheaper than I can find in Downham Market.

The promotion of women's health is a team job. The Government have their part to play. The Government have done just that in many vital areas, but if their policies are to be translated into effective action there must be local professional conviction, local action, local promotion, local involvement of all agencies in both the private and the voluntary sector and acceptance by the individual woman that her health is her responsibility.

1.20 pm

Mr. John Hughes (Coventry, North-East): I am most grateful for this opportunity to contribute to the debate. Having had to wait to speak for so long, I feel that I am suffering from what could accurately be diagnosed as "manopause."

Due to the effect of Government policies, there exists what I would describe as a Dorian Gray health service. Its looks bear little reality to health in general and to the many specialist areas of health care that are so important to women—none more so than primary care in the home.

It is a fact that all the knowledge gained from many health surveys has established that in areas of deprivation where there is high unemployment the physical and mental health of families is considerably worse than that of families in employment. Until recently, however, direct evidence that unemployment causes poorer health was not available. There is now substantial evidence that unemployment causes a deterioration in both physical and mental health.

Although the well-established pattern of women having lower death rates than men but experiencing higher sickness rates still holds true, recent studies have shown that the position is far more complex. Women's health varies according to social class, employment and marital status in ways that are only just beginning to be understood. The health of working-class women is particularly poor.

Striking regional disparities in health can still be observed. What is becoming increasingly clear from fresh evidence are the great inequalities that exist between communities living side by side in the same region. Numerous studies at local authority ward level have pinpointed pockets of poor health that correspond to areas of social and material deprivation. Alongside them, areas with much better health profiles can be detected and they exhibit more affluent characteristics.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): My hon. Friend might like to know that in 1986 the key population and vital statistics of local authority and health authority areas showed that women married to men in the manual socio-economic category suffered from three times as much chronic sickness as the wives of men who are classified as professionals. I represent part of Tower Hamlets, one of the most deprived areas in the country. It has the highest morbidity rate in London. The morbidity rate is inversely related to socio-economic groups, so I could not agree more with what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Hughes: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution and I hope that the Minister will note it.

The differential is also to be found in other groupings. Although there has been a fall in all-cause death rates in Britain, the improvements in health have not been experienced equally by all sections of the population. Non-manual groups have experienced a much greater decline in death rates than manual groups. Thus, the gap between the two groups has widened. Futhermore, the number of deaths from coronary heart disease and lung cancer has increased alarmingly in the manual groups, whereas there has been a substantial decline in the number of such deaths in non-manual groups. There is also a widening gap between rates of chronic sickness in the manual and non-manual groups.

In our society of abundant poverty, those are the inequalities of health that apply to the deprived areas of Coventry, such as Willenhall, Stoke Aldermoor, Wood End and Foleshill, which have higher mortality rates and more ill health than other areas. The provision of health care, which comes under the jurisdiction of Lady Butterworth, the chairperson of the Coventry family practitioner committee, fails to take that background into consideration. Instead, Lady Butterworth allocates the same number of deputising calls to each practice in Coventry. She makes no allowance for social class or the health status of the patients in a practice. In the process, she exacerbates the inequalities of health, to the detriment of young mothers with children and old women who require practitioner services.

During her period in office, Lady Butterworth has refused permanently to allocate an extra allowance for the deputising service to practices located in the areas that I have mentioned. That leaves doctors with two choices: they can dispense more prescriptions, which would result in a worsening service for women in deprived areas at even higher cost to the taxpayer, or they can caringly and humanely respond to calls above their allocation and find themselves subjected to the most detailed investigation. The doctors in one practice had to explain their actions over a period of 365 days.

With iron-fisted rigidity, Lady Butterworth applies the most draconian measures when a little understanding and a small amount of extra allowance—the cost of which would be far less than the cost of extra prescriptions—would result in better care for women. She refuses to recognise that women suffer from major illnesses and require visits from the doctor more frequently outside normal hours than is provided for in the average allowance. In women's interests, she is obliged to ensure that such visits are available. In other parts of the country such miserly allocation has led to general practitioners who realise that they cannot win applying to opt out of night and weekend work and to forgo the related fees. That is to the detriment of women and I am determined that that will not happen in Coventry.

I feel that it would be in the interests of the well-being of women patients in Coventry if a new chairperson were appointed to the Coventry family practitioner committee, as the present chair has failed to fulfil her duties in many ways. She has allowed money obtained by fraud, which should have been used for the well-being of women in the deprived areas of Coventry, to be retained by a practitioner. She has allowed a single-practice doctor, who claimed a partnership allowance, attracting a higher payment entitlement, fraudulently to retain £42,000, and so failed to imitate the exemplary chairmanship of her predecessor, who recovered £19,000 in similar circumstances. Fraud appears to be condoned when a chairperson of the FPC refuses to carry out the instructions of the committee by suggesting that the matter be buried and when no attempt is made to recover the money. The case was covered up and the police were not informed.

This culpable default of duty also applies in the case where a GP is allowed to retain a fortnight's income when that GP, against the interests of his women patients and in complete breach of his contract, disappeared for two weeks' holiday.

The circumstances in Coventry require immediate investigation. The present term of office of the chairperson should be instantly teminated if the chair has not the grace to resign in the meantime.

The attitude that prevailed impaired even my representations when I sought the assistance of the Minister because of the failure of the FPC to provide adequate and stable care for one of my chronically sick constituents, who had been shunted from doctor to doctor after being placed for only the minimum period. I am certain that that is only the tip of the iceberg and that many more patients are being subjected to a process that is a contradiction of the ethos of the Hippocratic oath.

The circumstances in Coventry, to which I have drawn the attention of the House, are not unique—I am sure that they exist elsewhere. In the interests of women patients, there should be a committee of inquiry into the whole process of the FPC service so that we can eliminate the malpractice that has occurred in Coventry. In the interests of my constituents, I shall resubmit to the Minister the names of Coventry patients who are currently experiencing serious problems under the FPC service. I hope that that will enable her to resolve the problems with some urgency during her ministerial investigation.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Thank you for calling me to speak in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am becoming a little worried about the health of the non-lady Members of the House who are not with us today. I am sure that they are grossly damaging their health with fatty lunches in pubs. I am sorry that they are not here to hear some very interesting speeches.

When I learnt of today's debate, I cancelled my constituency engagement with the Tavistock under-fives group this afternoon. The mothers asked me to raise a number of points on their behalf, but most of them have already been most capably raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard). However, one point that she did not raise—unless I missed it—is a crucial issue on which I intend to touch lightly, and that is the need for more women doctors. This is no sexist or feminist comment because it is of particular importance to the Moslem community.

Although I understand that the Koran does not literally forbid women to consult male doctors, by custom and habit many of the older women do not do that and their health is therefore significantly undermined. They may have potentially life-threatening conditions, that actually result in death, because they cannot consult a male doctor. Therefore, the provision of more women doctors is of acute importance to society.

The key to good health in our society lies in greater stress on preventive medicine. I want to talk a little about how preventive medicine is currently practised in the United Kingdom and how it could be improved. The most dramatic aspect of preventive medicine is immunisation, which can change the whole pattern of public health. It is, therefore, good news that the World Health Organisation has withdrawn its opposition to immunisation, which it once viewed as achievable only at the expense of building up the necessary infrastructures for health care.

Ms. Harman: I should not want this interesting debate to pass without some mention of the measles epidemic. Will the hon. Lady join me in urging everyone to take their children for immunisation, which is almost entirely without risk? I am glad to see the Minister nodding.

Miss Nicholson: I was intending to touch on that matter in a moment, but I am pleased to join my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) in stressing the need for immunisation. In overseas countries, it is easier to spot the fact that the measles virus has mutated into a killer disease. It is no longer just the few lumps and bumps that it might have been in our childhoods.

Smallpox immunisation was the first great example of successful vertical programme intervention. Worldwide eradication of smallpox—the great achievement of the World Health Organisation—has been completed and is a triumph.

The United Nations task force on child survival recently announced that it planned globally to eradicate polio, another of the great crippling and killing childhood diseases, by the year 2000. That is a great tribute to the International Rotary Polio Plus campaign, which was launched some years ago. It has taken the World Health Organisation a little time to agree that the eradication of polio can be conducted separately from, but while continuing, immunisation against the other five major childhood diseases.

I pay tribute to the Save the Children Fund Stop Polio campaign. Ten million pounds was raised and spent in the first four years of its existence alongside the Rotary Polio Plus campaign. That campaign has now been subsumed into the overall immunisation programme.

Polio is a major problem for developing countries. For example, in India, every year 200,000 children catch polio. Many more do so in Africa. In Malawi, when we ran the Stop Polio campaign for the Save the Children Fund, five or six years ago we achieved 90 per cent. coverage. By contrast, at that time in Lambeth, polio immunisation had a 37 per cent. take-up. The crucial importance of communicating with mothers and children simply cannot be overestimated. It is almost the most important factor after development of the vaccine.

It is marvellous that, at last, in this country we are starting by immunisation, the long haul to eliminate CSR —congenital syndrome rubella. We should think hard about the initiatives taken by the Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind. We clearly appreciate the values of immunisation in developing countries, so perhaps we should apply them nearer home. As recently as 1982, the Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind convened a conference to discuss rubella and its tragic and miserable consequences. The risk of pre-natal damage from rubella is highest in the first four months of pregnancy. If a woman catches rubella in the first month, her child may suffer multiple handicaps—deafness, blindness, and physical and mental handicaps.

About a fortnight ago I talked to a man in my constituency about the Abortion (Amendment) Bill. His mother caught rubella in about the fourth or fifth month of pregnancy. He has a weak heart, poor eyes, poor ears, and bad health. He said how much he would have wished not to be alive had his mother caught that illness earlier. That is an important point to remember.

I strongly welcome the 1 October introduction of the MMR vaccine—measles mumps and rubella. Measles is a wretched, mutative virus. I recognise the need to get rid of it as fast as we can. Of course, we are late in that respect, as so often we are late. MMR has been used in the United States of America for perhaps 20 years. In 1970 we started our anti-rubella programme for schoolgirls of 10 to 14 years, whom we saw as the vunerable age group. But the MMR vaccine will be given to 15-month-old babies. I understand that we seek a 90 per cent. uptake, which will allow us to eliminate rubella in particular, and, I hope, measles and mumps. The booster pre-school package of diphtheria, tetanus and polio will include MMR.

It used to be said that one could not eliminate such contagious diseases and that smallpox was unique because it was carried only by humans. The great advantage of the polio immunisation programme was to counter that suggestion. Polio is carried by primates. It is a water-borne disease, and medical experts said for a long time that it was ineradicable because no sooner would it be eliminated in a group of human beings than they might catch it again from primates through the water supply. When immunisation is built up in children and babies, the human race seems able to deflect the disease. It is enormously encouraging, therefore, to see that genuine eradication of contagious diseases other than smallpox is a possibility.

I should like to pay a strong tribute, in regard to the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine, to the Rubella Council, which was formed as a result of the 1982 Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind initiative. The council is chaired by Jean Wilson, who is the wife of the chairman of the Royal Commonwealth Society for the Blind. Like the council, I welcome the extra £40,000 a year grant, which brings its funding up to £83,000 a year.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) has had to leave, because he would be interested to know that the funding is for promotional purposes, not for eradication. If the £35,000 that the council has been running on for the past five or six years is anything to go by, it will do a remarkable job with the additional £40,000. The funding is not to enable the council to immunise 15-month-old babies but to enable it to tell mothers and everyone else that 15-month-old babies need the new immunisation.

This is a good example of successful partnership between the Government and the voluntary sector. I welcome that in health care. I have participated in such partnership and I know that it works. With the Save the Children Fund, I participated in the anti-rickets campaign. We mistakenly thought that we had eliminated rickets from the United Kingdom many years ago, but without sufficient vitamin D people will still suffer from it. People with darker skins, particularly the Asian community, have a predisposition towards rickets if they live in Britain because there is considerably less sun here to enable them to synthesise vitamin D. People with darker skins need significantly more sun to achieve the synthesising effect.

We had to reach out to Asian mothers, through the Asian community, to teach them to bring their children forward for additional supplies of vitamin D. The mothers had rejected officialdom already and I suggest that the heavy hand of Government would not have had the same effect. The very best of the non-governmental organisations have a lighter touch, a more personal approach, a sharper eye for human needs and more flexible rules which enable them more swiftly to meet those needs. It is a matter not of the state not being able to provide everything, but that it should not provide everything, because non-governmental organisations can provide some services better than the state can. The quality and effectiveness of provision should be the determining factors.

Mrs. Wise: Does the hon. Lady agree that providing cheap or free welfare milk for infants made a considerable contribution to the elimination of rickets and that it is a great pity that that does not happen nowadays?

Miss Nicholson: I am not absolutely sure about the vitamin D content of milk as compared with the benefits of sunlight. It is certainly true that when we eliminated rickets in the United Kingdom, free milk was supplied. Vitamin D comes from other sources, too.

My point about the Asian community in the United Kingdom is that people with darker skin need more sun to synthesise vitamin D. Those of us who have paler skins are acclimatised to our miserable lack of sun, and we are therefore able to use the limited sunlight more effectively. Because of the miserable problems—such as fear of going out and worries about safety—of Asian mothers, they and their babies stay indoors, so they do not benefit even from the minimal sunlight that is available. Extra-rich vitamin D foods, suggestions on diet and more fresh air, and, of course, oils rich in vitamin D, cod liver oil and so on, are offered by the National Health Service. However, it was the outreach to that community which mattered most. That is where the valuable partnership between the voluntary organisation and the Government comes into play, with the Government providing virtually all the funds, and the work being done by a highly respected child care organisation, well known internationally.

I turn to one aspect of the care of the elderly, but only briefly, not because it is not important but because time is short. I feel justified in raising in a debate devoted to women and health the plight of blind women. Most of the constituency of the Royal National Institute for the Blind consists of elderly women with visual problems. Women are considerably healthier than men. They live longer, they are tougher when they are babies and in many ways we are luckier than men. However, because of our long life, more elderly women than men are blind or have sight problems. As everyone knows, only a third of those who have visual problems are registered. One hundred and forty-six thousand people are registered as being blind and 82,000 as being partially sighted.

Ophthalmic surgery has advanced so rapidly, with the new technology for the removal of cataracts—using laser beams and lens implants—that major surgery can now be undertaken for people who have cataracts and ocular degeneration in old age. However, it is expensive and is far down the Government's list of priorities. I suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that more funding on this aspect of eye care would save money for the social services, apart from improving the quality of life of those who have their sight improved.

I welcome the recent announcement by the Minister for Social Security and the Disabled of a grant of £200,000 to the Royal National Institute for the Deaf, which is allowing fresh training provision to be undertaken by social workers who care for the deaf. That is an important element of work in our society, just as special training for social workers who care for the blind is important. That again is a partnership and an initiative involving a voluntary organisation and the Government.

1.47 pm

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): I appreciate the remarks that the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) made about the Asian community and voluntary organisations. I share her wish that voluntary organisations should be helped and encouraged in their work. In fact, it has been noticeable that during the lifetime of the present Government many voluntary organisations have felt that they are being pushed into being a substitute for the Government rather than playing their proper role as partners and carrying out the kind of work which the hon. Lady correctly outlined, and which cannot be done simply through professional organisations or governmental bodies.

The debate has set the topic of women's health in context, both establishing the importance of good health to women and, as they are the majority of the population, to society in general. We need not justify our anxiety about our own health by reference to our partners or our children. We should defend our right to health in our own terms and for our own benefit.

Nevertheless, as women are the major planners of family diets and have responsibilities—some of them inescapable and some which should be more shared—for child care, they do have a special place in society. I associate myself with my hon. Friends who have set that in the context of poverty and have talked about the impact of bad housing and unemployment on health. It is impossible to consider ill health without considering the ills of society.

I associate myself also with my hon. Friends' remarks about the need for a cross-departmental approach. One of the distressing features of the British style of Government, and perhaps this it true of others—I am not singling out Britain but it is Britain that I observe at close quarters from day to day—is that policy appears to exist in little boxes. Governing in that way simply does not work properly, especially in matters concerning women. I associate myself entirely with the remarks of my hon. Friends on the importance of the Departments of Employment, Transport, and Energy in this context.

References have been made to food, and there has been some give and take about whether it is possible to buy cheap, healthy food as easily in working-class areas as elsewhere. I remind the House that the British Medical Association has established clearly that a healthy diet costs more than an unhealthy one because of the extra cost of supplying enough calories. The individual salad and vegetable items that go to make up a healthy diet may not be excessively priced individually, but it is necessary to provide more food of that sort to obtain enough calories. That should not be ignored. Cost is important, and studies have shown, for example, that it is impossible for expectant mothers on supplementary benefit to provide adequate diets for themselves and their coming babies. Not enough attention is given to these matters by the Government when they reduce the incomes of such mothers.

Even if someone has the money and the wish to eat a healthy diet, it can be well-nigh impossible to achieve it. For example, it is of doubtful benefit to eat lettuces in the winter because of their nitrate levels. A person may want to have good quality food and may have the money to buy it, yet still find it unavailable because of the distortion of agriculture policy. This arises for two main reasons. One is the pursuit of short-term profit and the second is the distortion and wrongful use of public subsidy for purposes that are connected with economic and agriculture objectives that are of less importance than the maintenance of health. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has a great role to play in enabling the public to have a good diet, assuming that other Departments play their part and we manage to achieve suitable incomes and obtain sufficient knowledge to enable us to want and have a healthy diet.

I associate myself with the remarks that have been made about the desirablility of well woman clinics or centres. In Preston we have a good, popular well woman centre in which women doctors, non-professional helpers and counsellors participate, but it is absolutely tiny so it cannot cope with the demand that exists just underneath the surface. It does great work with ethnic minorities. Its ethnic minority worker, who has splendid contact with the whole of the considerable ethnic minority community, goes out from the clinic and does valuable work in the community.

We do not necessarily need a bigger centre—smallness can be desirable in this sort of context—but we need more of them. This one exists only because Preston borough council helped to find it premises and the district health authority helped it with money, but not enough. That is an area where we can have good partnership between voluntary workers, ancillary health-related people and professionals, such as doctors and nurses. But there needs to be pump priming, and that is not happening, so we have an inadequate network of well woman clinics—enough to show how valuable they are, but not enough to tackle the problems. I recommend the Minister to give that genuine consideration and to take action.

Well women give birth to babies, and maternity is not an illness. I greatly regret that over the years women have been forced into large district general hospitals which are geared to the treatment of illness and have found themselves cared for by people who are accustomed to abnormality rather than normality. The present concept of childbirth is almost one of medical crisis. That is wrong and we need to move in the opposite direction.

I urge the Minister most strongly to look at the need for continuity of care for women who are pregnant, in childbirth and after childbirth. It is monstrous when a woman goes to an antenatal clinic and does everything that the authorities exhort her to do—going monthly, then fortnightly and then weekly—that every time she sees a different midwife or doctor, and sometimes several of them attending to different bits of her. That is dehumanising for the woman and deskilling for the carers. We have gone too far along the wrong road.

I endorse what has been said about the need to pay women, nurses, doctors, health visitors and midwives properly. That is a necessary prerequisite, but job satisfaction, self-respect for clinical judgment are also important. Midwives have an excellent training which equips them to be practitioners in their own right and not to be the mere handmaidens of doctors. They exercise clinical judgment and are experts in normal birth. But they are not being given an adequate opportunity to exercise their clinical judgment. That is why the Labour party's approach in its good document on women and health, which will stand the test of time, puts great stress on the approach to maternity, maternity services and the role of midwives.

It is wrong for women to be treated as a collection of little "patches", which are seen by different people on every visit. It is also wrong that they are given entirely inadequate choice about the place and style of giving birth. More and more women are entering the controversy and making more and more demands, and I should like the Minister to commit herself to choice.

We hear a great deal from the Government about choice, which often amounts to the choice between two indistinguishable products on the supermarket shelves. In this instance, however, choice is a genuinely important element, because women are different and have different needs and wishes. There is not only one good pattern or one simple recipe for a good birth experience and a good outcome. In this context, a good outcome does not merely mean that the baby does not die: that is obviously imperative. It also involves the opportunity for bonding, and a positive feeling that does not make a woman say —as so many say immediately after giving birth—"Never again." That is not conducive to the development of a good relationship and good child care.

The argument is not between high-tech and low-tech; that would be a stupid argument. It is a matter of appropriate technology and adequate choice, neither of which is at present available. Many women are subjected to far too much intervention when giving birth, and a much too lavish use of expensive technology which they do not want or need. Others are deprived of, for example, adequate anaesthesia when they need it, because anaesthetists are too scarce, and the one who is there is busy with someone else. That is a nonsense. We need appropriate technology, no unnecessary intrusion and respect for women's wishes—as well as an acknowledgement by all concerned that as women's bodies swell their brains do not shrink.

The position is now so serious that some midwives leave the service because they are unhappy with their conditions, while others are driven outside the NHS to practice independently so that they can provide continuity of care. That is not because they want to be outside the NHS, but because this approach to maternity care is becoming unavailable on the NHS. We should look carefully at this phenomenon.

We should also look at the effect on midwives' ability fo exercise their clinical judgement. I do not know whether the Minister is aware of the controversies that are currently raging, but they bear on this. One instance is the disciplining of a midwife who decided to transfer her patient to hospital and, instead of waiting for an ambulance, accompanied the patient in a car driven by the patient's husband. That midwife has been disciplined for not waiting for an ambulance, although she exercised her clinical judgement about what was suitable, and she was right. There was a good outcome.

I should like to know who would have been disciplined if the midwife had waited for the ambulance and it had not come—for ambulances are increasingly scarce—or if it had come and had therefore been unable to go to someone else. Such an approach to the exercise of a midwife's clinical judgment is absolute rubbish. I should also like to know who is disciplined if there is unnecessary and intrusive use in hospitals of techniques such as episiotomy, which often have a very bad effect on women. I urge the DHSS to investigate that very carefully.

I welcome the breast-feeding initiative and I applaud anything that is done to encourage it. Breast feeding is extremely important for both mother and baby. The more time that elapses, the more work is done and the more information published to strengthen the argument for it. It is not, however, simply a matter of lecturing women about its importance. One Conservative Member said that the importance of breast feeding had to be "drummed in" to women. I can think of nothing less effective than trying to drum something in to women, although I hope that the hon. Member did not mean it in quite the way it sounded. Unfortunately, much of the health exhortation to women comes over in exactly that way: "Why can't you be a good little girl and do what is proper? Don't you care about your baby?" And such like. It is monstrous to behave in such a manner to women who are frequently suffering the greatest stress and pressure which is not being addressed by those who exhort them

I should like steps taken to prevent, not just to discourage—we are not talking about voluntary codes of practice—the promotion of baby milk formulas in hospitals and clinics. Such promotion still takes place and as long as the manufacturers of powdered milk have access to clinics and hospitals, mothers will be influenced to think that such products are the best for their babies.

Staff must have not only the right attitude, but enough time. That may mean that more staff should be available. Staff should not be harassed and, in their approach to hospital activities, they should not be made to believe that the efficient use of hospital resources means that they are kept almost at a run all day long while on duty. Staff should have the time to develop relationships with the women and observe them to see what can be done to make breast feeding the joy that it can be.

I also think that the Department should consider weaning. It is virtually impossible to obtain single weaning foods. Foods like "bacon and egg dinners" thrust at women as weaning foods. Any mother who has an eye to weaning her child sensibly, food by food, finds it difficult to get to first base even if she has the knowledge and income to do so. Something should be done and that means interfering with the free market economy. Such a free market economy often puts our infants second to money making, and that is highly undesirable.

During and after maternity women need back-up help, not just lectures. They need home helps, for example. If they have a home help after childbirth they should not be made to feel that some elderly person has therefore been deprived of such help. The squeeze on local government is having a deplorable effect on the availability of such help.

I urge the Minister to consider a submission from the National Childbirth Trust on infant mortality. It has suggested a number of topics for investigation, ranging from excessive obstetric interference through to the effect of poverty and bad housing on the increase in respiratory infection among babies, which can be an underlying feature in cot deaths. The National Childbirth Trust has a great deal of experience of mothers and babies and it pinpoints poverty and bad housing as being likely to have an effect on infant mortality. It believes that such factors should be investigated.

Another matter that should be considered is the danger of radiation. It is appropriate that this debate has taken place this week, after the information published about Dounreay.

Ms. Ruddock: I had hoped to be able to make a speech about environmental pollutants but I shall not get the opportunity. May I draw the attention of my hon. Friend and the Minister to early-day motion 1080? It is the only one on the Order Paper about women and health matters. It is a request to the Government to instruct the National Radiological Protection Board to investigate radiological standards. Current standards are based on the whole body male. We know, and scientific evidence shows, that for women and children the risk from ionising radiation is much greater than the risk to men. The risk to the foetus in the womb is considerable and there is probable evidence that the tragic child leukaemia deaths from the Dounreay area may well have resulted from radiation affecting the foetus. Through my hon. Friend may I ask the Minister to look into this matter?

Mrs. Wise: I associate myself entirely with my hon. Friend's intervention. I shall not repeat it, but I reinforce it.

The hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West said that women live longer than men. We are grateful for that, but it does not follow that the quality of life and health of most women is better than that of men. We are survivors, but women often survive against great odds and with greatly impaired health for many years. They suffer considerable stress and strain and physical ill health.

Simply living longer is not a good enough objective. We must achieve a better quality of health for women and it is not enough simply to say that we can stick a bandage on the Health Service or issue umpteen prescriptions for tranquilisers or tranquilise the whole population so that it does not see what happens to society. Sometimes I think that that is happening. We need an attitude to health that looks at the whole person in health care and medicine and not simply at isolated symptoms. As public policy we need to look at the whole of society. We need adequate preventive medicine for our society. I end as I began, by placing the matter of women's health care in the context of poverty and deprivation and the need for new priorities.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): I am glad to have been called to speak in the debate. While it may appear to be discourteous to make my contribution late in the day, I trust that the fact that I have been treating patients is an acceptable reason. That also registers my interest in the subject.

I think that this is the first general debate that we have had on women's health. Nowadays it seems fashionable to link women's interests to those of various minority groups. I speak as a member of a minority group—as a member of the male sex—and I have never quite understood the logic of that linkage. I certainly make no complaints and hope that with improvements in women's health care the present ratio and happy state of affairs will continue. Perhaps I could make a plea to my hon. Friend the Minister for a debate in due course on men's health or perhaps for a debate on some non-sexist subject such as geriatric health.

I am sure that the House approves of the unmistakable trend in the world of medicine towards prevention. The last century saw the first public health revolution and a reduction in the ravages of infectious diseases by means of better nutrition, cleaner water and air, and innoculation. We are now in the era of the second public health revolution and it is possible to educate people to reduce the risk of developing disease by modifying their behaviour and lifestyle. This is applicable in cardiovascular, respiratory and gastro-intestinal conditions and can be done without making life miserable.

When I became a medical student 24 years ago, teaching was virtually confined to the cure of disease. The notion of screening apparently healthy individuals was in its infancy. Specific tests were introduced gradually for presymptomatic disease. In addition to the admirable work of the National Health Service, the private sector is to be congratulated on pioneering the general screening of individuals. For many years I have been active in that work and in the identification of occupational hazards to the health of male and female employees.

Screening for cancer of the cervix and breast will clearly attract most attention in any discussion of women's health. However important those aspects may be, they represent too narrow a view of women's health generally. The effectiveness of cervical smear testing, which has been available for more than 20 years, depends on technical efficiency. I was alarmed recently by reports of deficiencies in the taking of such tests, which often impede sound diagnosis by yielding false positive results, which alarm patients unduly, or false negatives, which create a false sense of security. The credibility of the test depends on the technique of taking it so as to ensure that the laboratory interpretation is valid. I cannot emphasise enough the input that there must be in teaching hospitals to ensure that medical students are adequately taught.

All such efforts are useless if those at risk do not come forward. For 20 years, Sutton and Merton health education unit has pioneered increasing awareness among the public and encouraged people to come forward through the National Health Service, voluntary organisations, industry and schools. Screening is flawed—perhaps fatally, in the true sense of the word—if the administration of recall is inadequate. I congratulate the Government on the steps that they have taken to computerise the recall system.

Breast cancer has, to an extent, been the poor relation in public awareness and resources allocation. That is curious because, on a per capita basis, more lives are saved at less cost. The incidence of mortality from breast cancer is far greater than that from cervical cancer, with 15,000 deaths per year at all ages as opposed to 2,000—a sevenfold difference, which the House would ignore at its peril. Those statistics show the way forward for the future, and I am delighted that St. Bartholomew's hospital has been active in implementing the recommendations of the Forrest report. I hope that the Government will be flexible and examine the results in relation to the right age bracket. We must bear in mind that if women have a family history of carcinoma of the breast they are far more at risk than others who have palpable findings on clinical examination.

I am amazed in my consulting room, at the many bright female graduates, who often work in the financial world and are clearly better at examining balance sheets than their breasts. I hope that the statement, "Doctor, I do not know what I am looking for", will have no relevance in the 1990s, and there will be no repetition of the heroic but horrific surgery that was recommended by some of my teachers, which resulted in physical and psychological mutilations to so many women. I do not deny that lives were saved, but at what cost?

Ms. Gordon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: I am working against the clock; I apologise for any discourtesy.

There is insufficient public recognition of the correlation between smoking and cancer of the cervix. The increased incidence of smoking by women is almost certainly the main factor behind cancer of the lung that is now challenging cancer of the breast as the main malignant killer of women. Smoking will also increase the major cause of death, which is ischemic heart disease. My hon. Friend the Minister referred to the fact that it results in the the delivery of small babies.

It is illogical and bad medicine to limit the examination of women to organs that are peculiar to them without at the same time checking their blood pressure and advising them on issues such as weight and smoking. I hope that my hon. Friend will develop the theme of primary health care for women, since they are such valuable members of the community.

2.20 pm

Mrs. Currie: By leave of the House, I should like to respond to an excellent debate. I am conscious of the fact that some hon. Members have not had the opportunity to speak. We may need to have another debate. We heard splendid speeches, particularly from Lady Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard), for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), and from my hon. Friends the Members for Winchester (Mr. Browne) and for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes). I listened with interest to the speeches of other hon. Members. Some hon. Members have sat here for four hours waiting to speak. I apologise to any men including my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon, who felt left out. However, on 23 October we had a full day's debate on prevention when we concentrated on heart disease, which particularly affects men. Perhaps today, therefore, is the women's turn.

As to whether anybody is taking any notice of campaigns on health, I refer hon. Members to the food purchasing patterns, reported in the national food survey every quarter by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It shows that people are making strenuous efforts, by their purchasing patterns of food for consumption in the home, to eat much healthier food.

I am also grateful to those Lady Members who have had to leave but who were courteous enough to let me know. The hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) made quite the nicest speech that I have heard her make since she returned to the House. I am grateful to her for her kind remarks about our campaign on breast feeding. I suspect that female Members of Parliament on both sides of the House are much nicer and much more courteous to each other than their male counterparts. I venture to suggest —it is a remark of total prejudice—that if, nay when, there are more female Members of Parliament, behaviour will improve dramatically.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Hughes) asked a number of specific questions relating to Coventry. I hope that he will allow me to read what he has said and to write to him, particularly about the family practitioner committee. I am grateful to a number of hon. Members for referring to measles. We are very concerned about measles, as the disease has resulted in the death of six children this year. We have already made approaches to general practitioners. We shall have to consider whether those approaches have been successful and, if not, what else we can do.

A number of hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West referred to the introduction of MMR—the measles, mumps and rubella vaccine—in the autumn. That is a major step forward and we hope that it will be of considerable benefit. It will cost the Government rather more than £40,000 or £80,000. We are budgeting for several million pounds because we shall have to pay for the vaccine. However, we expect it to result in a considerable long-term saving. About 2 per cent. of women who are susceptible to the disease catch rubella every year. Between 300 and 400 women feel obliged every year to check whether their babies have been handicapped in any way. We know of 20 cases of congenital syndrome rubella every year, each one of which could have been prevented.

The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) referred to a number of issues and talked about the scandal of the VDUs. Unless any hon. Member should think that I am referring to a sexually transmitted disease, I should explain that VDU stands for visual display unit. The hon. Lady and I know that, but my experience in this job suggests that not everybody understands precisely what it means. The hon. Lady and I are referring to people who may or may not be affected by working in circumstances in which they are obliged to be close to a VDU for long periods.

The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council published a report on non-ionising radiation in December 1987. During its investigations, the council considered the possibility of VDUs being a potential source of harmful radiation. It concluded that there was no evidence to suggest that the present terms of prescription for industrial injuries purposes should be extended to cover any potential effects of non-ionising radiation from VDUs. The Government accepted those recommendations. As I have suggested, I suspect that at least part of the problem may arise from the fact that women get far too little exercise. Perhaps we may encourage companies and employees to take that into account. That is the scientific evidence on VDUs as it stands at the moment.

A number of Labour Members referred to the social security system. I would point out that in this country the pension scheme in particular contains several features that are very favourable to women. For example, we retire five years earlier than men. Under the United Kingdom scheme the married woman has the right to obtain a pension of her own through her husband's contributions if she wishes. There is nothing similar in most European countries.

Hon. Members have spoken of poverty. The hon. Member for Preston said that the BMA had established that a healthy diet cost more. My nutrition unit tells me that there has been no such report from the BMA, although the report from the Maternity Alliance was referred to earlier. If the hon. Lady has futher information, we should be delighted to hear it. We do not know that the BMA or anyone else has established that a healthy diet costs more. I do not believe it. It costs nothing to throw away the frying pan or to replace one kind of fat with another and it is probably cheaper simply to eat less fat.

A number of hon. Members on both sides of the House called for a cross-departmental committee. I am reminded of that splendid series, "The Wheeltappers' and Shunters' Club," which used to appear on television. The programme often used to start, "We've got to get a committee together on this." In fact, there is already a committee—the ministerial group on women's issues, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office and which considers some of the issues that have been raised. There is also the Women's National Commission, which is part of the Cabinet Office, which is ably chaired by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Education and Science. I have no doubt that that commission will take into account a number of points that have been made.

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake is in her place. I do not know whether she has been reconstructed recently but she is looking absolutely splendid these days. It must be to do with her responding vigorously to everything that previous Ministers and I have said recently. I am very glad to see my hon. Friend, who has been a doughty fighter for women since she came to the House 18 years ago. I am extremely grateful to her for her remarks, and for encouraging women in her constituency to have smear tests.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake mentioned breast amputation and women's concern about that. I am glad to be able to tell her that a recent study has shown that between 1980 and 1986 in 80 centres in this country the ratio of mastectomy to conservative surgery such as lumpectomy has shifted from around 50-50 to about 20-80. In other words, about 80 per cent. of surgery does not involve full amputation. However, conservative surgery is not suitable in all cases and clearly more work remains to be done on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake and a number of other hon. Members referred to women doctors. I shall undertake to send a copy of the detailed press release sent out on Wednesday by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health about the publication of Isobel Allen's report. The release is entitled "Women Doctors—Any Room at the Top?" Incidentally, a minute that I received about smoking in DHSS offices was entitled "The Empire Strikes Back"; clearly someone in my Department has a sense of humour.

The detailed minute that has been issued shows both our concern that there should be more women doctors and our interest in what happens when they start on their career path. Action is already under way, or is being set in hand, on a number of the issues identified in Isobel Allen's excellent report. We recognise, for example, the demands for more part-time career posts and we shall discuss with representatives of the Health Services and the medical profession the possibility of increasing them. We shall also discuss with the Royal colleges and faculties, postgraduate deans and health authorities, ways of eliminating questioning by appointments boards that can be seen to be discriminatory. To assist that process we are arranging two seminars to promote consideration of Miss Allen's report by representatives of health authorities and the medical professions. I am conscious that I lay myself open to the criticism from the hon. Member for Barking that there tend to be a great number of seminars—but they work. The hon. Lady will remember that in the Labour party document on health that it published in preparation for the election, the only picture of a doctor was of a man.

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester raised issues concerning his constituency, and he knows that we are concerned about them. My hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West, in an outstanding contribution, set out exactly how a good service for women should be run. That spills over into other forms of health care, where the needs and the interests of the consumer, male and female, really start to matter. That is the sort of service that we are trying to promote for women, children and men throughout the country.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Maternity Facilities (Moray)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

2.30 pm

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): It is, perhaps, appropriate that at the end of an extensive debate that touched on so many issues affecting women's health, we should move on to specific issues affecting the well-being of the women in my constituency.

I wish to start with a few personal remarks. Yesterday I attended the funeral of Dr. Allan Matheson, who was a key figure in all our efforts in Moray not only to improve maternity services but to enhance all of Moray's medical facilities. Like me, the community of Keith has been devastated by his tragic and untimely death at the age of 39. All of us remember his unstinting work in his community—his selfless, sincere and abiding concern for all the patients in the local practice. His commitment to those with special needs was reflected in his work for the Sunshine playgroup, his involvement with the Keith patients participation group, the local parent teachers' association and the Keith caring service. Keith has lost a great friend. As was said at his funeral yesterday, it is a fitting memorial to his life and his work that his activities helped to persuade Grampian health board to retain a maternity unit in the Turner memorial hospital. I am sure that the Minister, who met Allan Matheson during that campaign, will join me in recording our deepest sympathy to his wife Hazel and his children Kirsty, Rhona and Duncan.

To return to the issue of the debate, I understand that the Scottish Office has received a full submission from the Grampian health board recommending that five general practitioner maternity units should be closed. I note the Minister indicating dissent, but must tell him that I was given that advice last week when I spoke to a representative of the board. I apologise if the Minister has not yet received it, but it is certainly on its way. The submission is to close the five GP maternity units in the area, with no further consideration being given to the possible establishment of a specialist obstetric and gynaecological unit in Elgin.

My first key questions, therefore, are can the Minister say when the Scottish Office will give a response, how will the announcement be made, and what provision will be made in the coming weeks for representatives of the Scottish Office to meet local interested groups representing both the medical profession and the public? Such meetings would be desirable before any final decision is reached.

As the Minister well knows, the Grampian health board's proposals met with universal antagonism throughout the region. While this debate relates specifically to Moray, I wish to emphasise the general principles underpinning that reaction. Together with the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) and the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), I have argued that women in rural areas have the right to give birth in local hospitals. All three of us, irrespective of party politics, feel most strongly that choice and safety are being ignored, and we resent the centralising philosophy that denies our mothers the right to have access to local facilities that, over the years, have been marked by the highest standards of care and practice.

Our mothers are to be asked to undertake hazardous and lengthy journeys. They will be removed from the familiar surroundings of their local units and distanced from family and friends at a time when they wish to be in their local communities. All three of us believe that that is against the interests of our constituents and communities. We are certain that no good reason has been put forward for doing that.

There are two key issues in Moray. First, Leanchoil hospital in Forres is to lose its maternity unit and all mothers are to be transferred to Raigmore hospital in Inverness, which is in a different health board area. It appears that complex negotiations—though not public negotiations—have taken place between Grampian and Highland health boards, and the former will pay the latter for such obstetric facilities. Will the Minister give me some guidance? First, what costing of that deal has Grampian health board given? Secondly, are the obstetricians based in Inverness prepared to accept full responsibility for all aspects of pregnancy, labour, delivery, neonatal and paediatric care that were previously dealt with by general practitioners in Forres?

Thirdly, is the Minister satisfied that Raigmore hospital will be able to cope with increased numbers, including the provision of lying-in facilities for new mothers? Fourthly, has any costing been made or will a costing be made of accepting the suggestion from Leanchoil general practitioners that the current 12-bed unit be reduced to six beds, with the other beds being given to orthopaedic facilities? Fifthly, has any account been taken of the importance attached to Leanchoil by young RAF families based at RAF Kinloss? Sixthly, what safety net is to be left for emergencies for Forres mothers who, for whatever reason, cannot travel to Raigmore?

Dr. Russell Lees, a consultant obstetrician and gynaecologist at Raigmore, commented:

"We, the Consultants in the Department of Obstetrics in Raigmore view with anxiety the prospect of an increased demand for home confinements which could conceivably arise as a result of the closure of the maternity unit at Leanchoil and it is for that reason that we would support the retention of a six bedded unit at Forres for uncomplicated deliveries with the additional benefit of "lying in" facilities for those mothers who deliver their babies in Raigmore but whose medical condition is such that they can be looked after in the early days . . . in a hospital nearer home."

That issue directly affects Forres and the western side of my constituency.

The next main issue for Moray is the need to establish a full-scale specialist obstetric unit in Elgin, which is regarded as the centre of the district. Perhaps the fate of the Turner memorial and Leanchoil hospitals would not have met such antagonism had Grampian health board offered us a locally based specialist facility. However, the long-held hope that Elgin would have such a unit has apparently been ditched for good by the board. Instead, Aberdeen and Inverness are to be the central points for such services. The suggestion is that all women east of the Spey will be asked to attend Aberdeen maternity hospital and that all women west of the Spey will be asked to attend Raigmore and Inverness hospitals.

On my latter point relating to the geographical area west of the river Spey, I again refer to comments made by Russell Lees, the consultant obstetrician at Raigmore hospital in Inverness. He stated:

"I feel I should add that the Consultants in the Department of Obstetrics at Raigmore view with some concern the prospect of transfer of maternity care patients in the Elgin area from Grampian Health Board to Highland Health Board, and we are uniformly of the opinion that without additional facilities in terms of beds and staff at all levels we could not provide a similar quality of care to that which is already provided by this Department for mothers from the Highland Region."

Dr. Lees said that against the background of an increase in the bed complement at Raigmore from 56 to 72. It is not enough to say that facilities at Raigmore have already been increased.

In whatever direction the mums in my constituency are pointed, they face lengthy and hazardous journeys along the A96—a road that is notorious for delays and accidents at all times of the year. Obviously, that road is most dangerous in winter. Recently, it was branded by the Inverness chamber of commerce as a goat track, and by the Royal Automobile Club as a death trap. In conjunction with all the district councils near that road, Highland and Grampian regional councils are mounting a major campaign to improve the A96. It seems unlikely that that will be within the immediate future, although piecemeal opportunities have been given for slight improvements on the road.

We must think of women who are in distress—perhaps already aware that the life of their baby is at risk—being driven over a road that they know is in poor condition. Often, they are already in labour, strapped to a drip, and in severe pain. No one could harden his or her heart to the psychological and physical stress that such an experience must create. We must remember that such women may not have their husbands with them, and may have left behind young children.

There is, of course, the flying squad. On page 10 of unit II's strategic plan for maternity and neonatal services in Grampian, it says:

"Once the Flying Squad call is received it takes an average 30 minutes to assemble medical staff, equipment and taxi and if the call is to Elgin, for example, then a further one hour 45 minutes transport time ensues to reach the destination. This delay may be crucial to patient management. Often, because of the time factor involved, the patient is sent by ambulance to Aberdeen and may deliver en route."

So now it is being suggested that a helicopter could form part of the normal service to mums in my area. The same report says that it should be part of the normal service to have a helicopter as a standby to transport mums in labour from my constituency.

I have never travelled by helicopter, but many who have —including my husband who is a member of a mountain rescue team—tell me that it is without doubt the most unpleasant and uncomfortable form of transport imaginable. The idea that women in labour and in stress should be asked to regard a helicopter as a mainstay is unpalatable.

We should consider Grampian health board's reasons for opposing the establishment of a specialist unit such as we want in Moray. The board says:

"There is no definitive guidance on the optimum population to be served by a full specialist obstetric facility".

It seems that, in the absence of definitive guidance, the board is prepared to reach its own definition. By using the Gavin Shaw report, which recommends a minimum of three consultant obstetricians, Grampian health board concludes that 1,100 births per year do not justify the establishment of such a unit.

My argument, like that of my fellow campaigners in Moray, challenges that assertion. I shall use the facts and fugures provided by MUM—the Maternity Unit for Moray campaign—which says:

"In a centre of population such as Moray, with 26,361 females aged 16-64 and 6,880 females aged 65-89, is it appropriate to provide obstetric and gynaecological services for the majority of these women, either 68 miles away in Aberdeen or 37 miles away in Inverness? Miss Hines, the Director of Midwifery Services in Grampian stated on 11 February 1988 at the public meeting in Elgin, that she could not justify or defend the decision of Grampian Health Board to continue to send mothers such distances for obstetric care."

On page 2 of its strategic plan, unit II says:

"The total number of births in Grampian will fall to approximately 6,500 by 1991: of these 1,300 babies will be born to women living in Moray. The numbers for 1996 are approximately 6,300 and 1,400 respectively."

In other words, we are anticipating an increased birth rate in the Moray district. We know that obstetric units which cater for smaller numbers have been established elsewhere in Scotland and I believe that, south of Perth, the norm for such facilities is a travelling distance of something less than 30 miles.

Grampian health board also believes that the number of cases that it predicts would not attract consultants of the quality that it desires. That must be one of the most spurious arguments that has been advanced. Elgin has never experienced any difficulty attracting consultants of the highest calibre on other specialties, and nobody but Grampian health board anticipates any difficulty in attracting obstetricians.

If population were used as the sole criterion for the establishment of specialist centres in rural communities, we could fully expect all specialist centres in Scotland to be based in cities. It is therefore an argument to which we cannot give any credence and I hope that the Minister, who also represents a rural constituency, will reject it.

I trust that the Minister will give us hope in Moray that the maternity services that we already have and appreciate will not be taken from us. Our GP units are of the highest standard and the public has shown its confidence in them by the demand for their retention. The files that I have on the Bench beside me represent the strength of feeling from my constituency. Those files contain letters of support and argument, not just from the GPs or from the medical practitioners within my constituency, but from hundreds of ordinary men and women who are deeply concerned about their community. This argument is not about statistics and, according to the Grampian health board, nor is it completely about costs. The argument is about life. It is about safety and proper medical care. In Moray we are refusing to be regarded as second-class citizens.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I was sad indeed to hear the news about Dr. Allan Matheson. I well recall the hon. Lady bringing a delegation to see me about the Keith maternity unit. The clear commitment that Dr. Matheson had to the community was evident from our discussions. I join the hon. Lady in expressing my condolences to his wife and family on such a tragic loss.

The hon. Lady expressed some surprise when I said from a sedentary position that I had not received the final submission from the Grampian health board. I received in April some preliminary material regarding its proposals for closure. Additional infomation was forwarded to my Department on 2 June, and the remainder is expected within the next fortnight. Therefore, I have to dissappoint the hon. Lady because I am unable to say very much today —in fact nothing—about the substance of the board's case or to reply to her arguments. However, I have had a large number of representations on this matter from a wide variety of opinions and from every section of the community in Moray. In fact, a few weeks ago I had a lengthy discussion with the chairman of the health council, Mrs. Rona Hossack. I have given an undertaking to the officers of the health council that before coming to any conclusions on the matter I will meet them to discuss the arguments. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that as going some way towards meeting her request that I should take account of local opinion on this matter before reaching a conclusion.

It clearly would not be appropriate for the Scottish Office to embark upon a whole new consultation process, because these matters are for the board. I am sure that the hon. Lady will forgive me if I make one rather pertinent observation. In this debate the hon. Lady is asking me and my right hon. and learned Friend to overturn the decisions of the Grampian health board and direct it to do something else. It was only a few weeks ago that she was strongly chiding me and criticising me in public for directing the health board on competitive tendering. She was then arguing that it was no part of the Secretary of State's duty to undermine the local autonomy of health boards. Having said that, the breadth of feeling on this matter is clear.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to intervene. I am conscious of the time constraint. Some of his latter comments have been mischievious but I shall not respond to them. On the issue of consultation within the community, and over and above meeting the representatives of the full health council, will it be possible for representations to be received from general practitioners in Forres, and will there be discussions with the obstetricians in Raigmore, which is within the Highlands health board.

Mr. Forsyth: I shall consider all the arguments, but it is the job of the health board to carry out the consultation process and reach conclusions, and it requires the consent of the Secretary of State. The hon. Lady is asking my right hon. and learned Friend to overturn its conclusions following its consultation, and it would not be appropriate for my right hon. and learned Friend to be involved in consultation. Having received strong representations from Mrs. Hossack, I agreed to meet officers of the health council before reaching any conclusion. I have agreed to meet a delegation that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith) is bringing to deal with the issue of Torphins prior to reaching any conclusions.

I have received representations from the Maternity Unit for Moray campaign and I shall examine carefully the specialist unit proposal. I have also received representations from regional and district councillors and others through the political network from the Moray Conservatives. I accept that it is an issue of concern to every sector of the community.

There was the hint in the hon. Lady's speech that resources have had a part to play—she referred to the overall level of funding available to the Grampian health board—but I do not believe that they have. Conclusions should have been reached on the basis of what will provide the best quality of patient care for the people of Moray. The Grampian health board has seen a substantial increase in the resources granted to it since the Government came to power. Since 1979, the amount of money available to the health board to meet running costs has increased by one third over and above inflation. The increase in capital resources that has been made available to the board to fund new developments and new hospital projects has been spectacular. That level of funding has almost doubled in real terms, there having been an increase of 96 per cent. since 1979.

I know that the hon. Lady will be aware of the difference between the resources that are available to the health boards now and those which were available when the Labour Government were in office, whom she and her party were keen to support.

When that Government were in office we saw a 28 per cent. cut in the capital expenditure made available to health boards in Scotland. These figures are sometimes dismissed as mere statistics or just numbers, but they are not. The increased funding that we have provided for Grampian is seen in new developments. Phase 1 of the new royal Cornhill hospital will begin construction in October and will improve the services that are available to the mentally ill. When I visited Foresterhill I announced that £3 million would be made available for the new blood transfusion centre that will open in 1991. More central to the hon. Lady's constituency interest is the redevelopment at Dr. Gray's hospital to replace the Maryhill maternity unit, which will cost more than £1 million. I recently announced the extension of cardiac surgery in Grampian that will result in a capital investment of about £1·2 million over a period. As we are now taking centrally the funding of cardiac surgery operations there, the result will be a windfall running cost benefit to the health board of about £250,000.

The board has benefited from some substantial extra money. I urge the hon. Lady to recognise that and to recognise also that any decisions should be based on what represents value for money. The review of maternity services is designed to ensure that the needs of the people are met as well as to ensure efficiency.

Lest these discussions seem to be limited to Grampian, let me say that other health boards are having to consider these matters. Lothian has had to consider the problem of the underutilisation of maternity beds. Clearly, it is in no one's interest to have beds which are staffed but which are not needed, because that constitutes a waste of resources. Today my right hon. and learned Friend has approved a restructuring of obstetric services in Lothian which will involve the closure of the Elsie Inglis maternity hospital in Edinburgh. He was prepared to give consent on the basis that for years there had been an oversupply and underuse of obstetric beds and that the position would be made worse because of the opening of new obstetric services in the Borders. He also took account of the facts that the proposals have the support of Lothian health board's professional advisory committees and that the savings will be fully available to the board to promote development and improvement in the services in other areas.

The hon. Lady asked about the A96. Fortunately, roads are not within my area of responsibility, but the importance of the A96 is fully recognised. Works worth some £6 million are under construction; £44 million worth of work is planned and a major feasibility study is under way. Progress on future schemes will be determined by the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures, the availability of finance and the priority of particular schemes within the context of competing claims from the entire trunk road network in Scotland.

The hon. Lady will forgive me for pointing out that in Scotland we enjoy a Health Service that is funded to the extent of rather more than a quarter more per head t n the Health Service in England. Our roads programme is also considerably better funded. Were it not for the fact that I would be called to order, I would be intrigued to hear from her how she imagines that continued support would be available if we were to follow the prescriptions of her party.

I shall listen carefully to all the arguments and study with the greatest possible care the papers, submissions and letters we receive in the Department. I am happy to hear from the hon. Lady of any additional arguments, other than those which she put in the debate and in correspondence with me. I will make arrangements to meet the officers of the health council. The personal remark which she addressed to me about my constituency interest and recognition of the problems of rural areas strikes home. I need no convincing because when my wife was expecting our latest child, the central thought in her mind was the 25 miles which were involved from Aberfoyle to Stirling, so I am aware of the anxieties and feelings. I shall ensure that the arguments are considered carefully before we reach a conclusion.

The hon. Lady asked when we would reach a conclusion. In the time-honoured phrase which trips off the tongue so easily after a mere year at this job, we would expect to reach a conclusion as soon as possible and shortly.

Question put and areed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes to Three o'clock.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Mother and Baby Units)

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women in prison mother-and-baby units on the most recent convenient date had not previously served a custodial sentence; what were their ages; and for what offences they had been sentenced.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Forty three women in mother and baby units on 13 May had not previously served a custodial sentence. Their ages are shown in table 1. They received custodial sentences for a wide range of offences and in many cases they were sentenced for more than one offence. Table 2 lists the primary offence in each case.

Civil Defence

Mr. Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current state of civil defence planning in the areas covered by the joint fire and civil defence authorities with particular reference to south Yorkshire, as evidenced by those authorities' submission in response to his Department's circular dated 30 October 1986, entitled "A planned programme of implementation"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The initial submissions in response to the circular were in the form of preparatory information on how the planning requirements of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983 would be met. These indicated that in general progress was being made in civil defence planning. In April 1988 county level authorities, including joint fire and civil defence authorities, were required to submit the first group of operational plans: these are now being considered.

Broadcasting Standards Council

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his statement of 16 May, Official Report, column 685, if he will specify the period of time for which he expects the Broadcasting Standards Council to be a non-statutory body.

Mr. Renton: We intend to introduce legislation for the Broadcasting Standards Council in due course, by which time I hope the council will have established satisfactory working arrangements with the relevant broadcasting and other agencies.

Strip Searches

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many strip searches were carried out on inmates, both sentenced and remand, and on female visitors to (a) Holloway, (b) Styal and (c) Durham prisons during the first three months of 1988.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Strip searching is a routine security measure in prison establishments to which both male and female inmates, including those on remand, are subject. Comprehensive records of strip searches are available only in respect of category A women prisoners, of whom there were three in Durham prison during the period in question. Details of the numbers of occasions on which these prisoners were strip searched were given in my replies to questions from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 16 February, at column 546, and 21 April, at columns 525-26.

If there is reason to believe that a visitor intends to smuggle drugs or other contraband into an establishment, it is the normal practice to call in the police to investigate the matter. Information is not available centrally regarding the action taken by the police in such cases.

Ethnic Monitoring

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the results of the ethnic monitoring survey of probation clients will be published.

Mr. John Patten: Information from the survey, which relates to individual probation areas, has already been given to those areas. The preparation of a full report on the survey has been delayed, but a report will be published as soon as possible.

Crime Statistics

Mr. William Shelton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders were found guilty of, or cautioned for, the offence of gross indecency with children, broken down by sex of the children for each year from 1967 to 1987.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is shown in the table for the years 1979 to 1986. Comparable data are not readily available for the years prior to 1979 and information for 1987 is not yet complete.

Mr. William Shelton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were found guilty of, or cautioned for, the offence of indecency between males, for each year from 1967 to 1987, showing how many offences were committed against boys aged less than 16 years.

Mr. John Patten: Information collected centrally does not identify those cases where the offence involved boys under the age of 16. Details of offenders found guilty or cautioned for all offences of indecency between males are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales", copies of which are in the Library. The most recent figures, covering the years 1977 to 1986, can be found in table 5.14 of the issue for 1986 (Cm. 233). Data for 1987 are not yet complete.

Firearms

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish in the Official Report details of the response he has had from the Advertising Standards Authority on the nature of advertisements for the sale of firearms by mail order.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The Advertising Standards Authority was not convinced that a statutory requirement of the sort proposed at Committee stage of the Firearms (Amendment) Bill on 10 March was practicable or would meet the concern expressed. The authority is considering whether the British code of advertising practice covering weapon advertising generally can be strengthened in some way.

PRIME MINISTER

Private Security Companies

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Prime Minister how many meetings have taken place from 1980 to the current date between Government Ministers or officials and representatives of the KMS private security company; and on which occasions Major (retd.) David Walker of KMS was present.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the replies which have been given to the many questions on this subject.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Company Statistics

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the share of the top 100 private sector companies in (a) manufacturing employment, (b) net manufacturing output and (c) net capital expenditure in 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information requested is presented in the following table:

Bankruptcies

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many private sector manufacturers were declared bankrupt in (a) England and Wales and (b) Great Britain in each year since and including 1979.

Mr. Maude: The information that is available for insolvencies in manufacturing is given in the table:

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how may private building contractors were declared bankrupt in (a) England and Wales and (b) Great Britain in 1985, 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Maude: The information that is available for insolvencies in the construction industry is given in the table:

	Bankruptcies[1] England and Wales	Company Liquidations[2] England and Wales	Company Liquidations[3] Great Britain
1985	788	1,975	2,069

[1] Bankruptcy orders, receiving orders and deeds of arrangement.
[2] Compulsory plus creditors' voluntary arrangements.
[3] January—September only.

Retail Sales

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many firms accounted for the upper half of retail sales in the United Kingdom in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Butcher: It is provisionally estimated that the largest 88 individual companies accounted for one half of retail sales in Great Britain in 1986. No estimate is yet available for 1987.

Goods (Distribution)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has about the distribution of (a) capital goods and (b) consumption goods imported from abroad by region of destination.

Mr. Alan Clark: I regret that this information is not available.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his policy with regard to dealing with those individuals and bodies in Wales who wish to communicate with his Department through the medium of the Welsh language.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 20 May 1988]: It is the practice of my Department's Companies Registration Office, Cardiff to respond in the Welsh language: more generally, my Department communicates in the English language except where it is considered appropriate and practical to do otherwise.

Action for Cities Programme

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the total expenditure by the Central Office of Information on the Government's action for cities programme for each month since its inception.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 18 May 1988]: The only significant expenditure incurred by the Central Office of Information was approximately £34,400 for the launch of the action for cties programme on 7 March. This represents a very small part of the Government's expenditure of approximately £3,000 million each year on inner cities programmes.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Development Aid

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list United Kingdom contributions to each of the member states of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference through national, Commonwealth and European Community action in each year from 1979 to 1987 inclusive (a) in cash and (b) in 1987 prices.

Mr. Chris Patten: For bilateral aid I refer the hon. Lady to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office gave her on 13 May, at column 250. Figures for Commonwealth aid are not readily available in the form requested. The United Kingdom share of European Community programmes is as follows:

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the level of official development assistance in 1987.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have today informed the development assistance committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that in 1987 net official development assistance as defined internationally was estimated to be £1,151 million. As a proportion of GNP it was equivalent to 0·28 per cent.

The net official development assistance figure for the calendar year 1987 compares with a net public expenditure provision for overseas aid of £1,247 million in the financial year 1987-88. The figure of net official development assistance as a proportion of GNP for 1987 reflects the strong growth in the United Kingdom economy last year and the fact that expenditure in the calendar year 1987 was lower than expected as a result of an unusually high proportion of financial year 1987-88 expenditure falling in the quarter ending 31 March 1988.

Increases in the aid programme announced in this year's public expenditure White Paper mean that aid is now planned to grow in real terms. The aid budget for this financial year is £70 million higher than for last year—an increase of 5·7 per cent., which is considerably in excess of the expected rate of inflation. The planned aid budgets for 1989-90 and 1990-91 provide for increases of £140 million and £185 million respectively over the budget for last year.

ENERGY

Nuclear Power

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his policy towards the development of nuclear power in the light of the report and recommendations of the Trades Union Congress review committee on nuclear power, published on 3 May, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government's policy on the development of nuclear power is as stated in the reply given by my right hon. Friend to the hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 17 December 1987 and in the White Paper "Privatising Electricity" (Cm. 322). I welcome the recognition given by the Trades Union Congress review committee to the importance of nuclear power.

Uranium

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he has given permission for the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority for the import of Namibian uranium since May 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority has imported no uranium from Namibia during this period.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether (a) the Central Electricity Generating Board, (b) the South of Scotland Electricity Board, (c) British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. or (d) the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority has sought permission and safeguards arrangements for the import of uranium from (i) Namibia and (ii) the Republic of South Africa, either directly or through a second or third country, since May 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Uranium for the United Kingdom's civil nuclear programme has not been imported from South Africa since 1973 or from Namibia since 1984. British Nuclear Fuels plc receives uranium ore concentrate from overseas customers for processing and re-export. The origin of such uranium is a matter for its customers who remain the owners of the material.

All uranium imported into the United Kingdom for these purposes is subject to Euratom safeguards and to the terms of the UK/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement.

Mersey Barrage Co. Ltd.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the visit by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), to Liverpool to hold talks with the Mersey Barrage Co. Ltd.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I visited Liverpool on Tuesday, 17 May, to make a joint announcement with the Mersey Barrage Company of a £1·3 million extension to studies of a possible Mersey barrage. The money will be used to finance further work on the engineering, economic and environmental aspects of the proposed barrage. Funding will be on a 50/50 basis between the Government and the Mersey Barrage Company.

Whilst in Liverpool I also took the opportunity to meet members of the Mersey Enterprise Forum and representatives of the shipping and environmental groups whose interests are likely to be affected by a barrage construction.

Advanced Gas-cooled Reactors

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list in the Official Report the designed generating capacity for each advanced gas-cooled reactor, the actual outputs currently being achieved, the reasons for any differences and details of the timetables and actions planned to rectify current operating difficulties.

Mr. Michael Spicer: These are operational matters for the Central Electricity Generating Board, and I have asked the chairman to write to my hon. Friend.

Coal Industry

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about the future of the coal industry social welfare organisation in the light of the Government's plans to privatise the coal industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government have no present plans to privatise the coal industry. The future of the coal industry social welfare organisation is one of the issues that would need to be considered in any such plans.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what plans there are for the discharge of low-grade nuclear waste into the sea from nuclear power stations after June.

Mr. Moynihan: I have been asked to reply.

There are no plans to change the current system of regulating discharges by authorisations issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Commonhold Tenure

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the responses he proposes to make to the conclusions reached by the Law Commission in its report of July 1987 on commonhold tenure proposals, "Strata Title."

The Attorney-General: The working group report Cm. 179, to which my hon. Friend refers, makes far-reaching recommendations. A decision on implementation will be taken when these have been fully considered.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Horniman Museum

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he has undertaken about the future of the Horniman museum after the proposed abolition of the Inner London education authority; and when he now expects to be able to announce firm proposals.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has concluded that, after April 1990, both the Horniman and Geffrye museums should be established as independent charitable trusts. To ensure the future of the two museums he proposes that, in addition to support they are able to raise from local authorities and the private sector, they should receive a grant, in the first instance, from the London Residuary Body, and in the longer-term from the museums and Galleries Commission. We now propose to discuss the details of these proposed arrangements with the museums, with ILEA and with the local authorities whose residents enjoy the services of the two museums.

School Rolls (Cumbria)

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish the most up-to-date figures for school rolls at secondary schools in Cumbria, together with the number of unused places at each school.

Mr. Dunn: The numbers on roll in secondary schools in Cumbria in January 1988, the capacities based on the DES work station and the number of empty places were as follows:

School name	Number on roll as at January 1988.	Capacity	Empty places
Alston, Samuel King's	93	177	84
Appleby Grammar	548	540	−8

Portage

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what plans he has to develop portage; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what is his estimate of the number of families with young children who need portage but do not obtain it.

Mr. Dunn: It is the responsibility of local education authorities to provide portage. Over the five-year period from 1986/87 the Department will have provided in excess of £8 million through the education support grant scheme for the development of portage. Every local education authority wishing to participate in this scheme has been offered support by the Department. It is up to local education authorities to consider future support once the ESG scheme comes to an end and to determine the number of families who would benefit from portage.

Universities and Polytechnics (Scientific Equipment)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the Advisory Board for the Research Council survey commissioned to look at scientific equipment in United Kingdom universities and polytechnics has been completed; when the Government expects to receive a copy of the results; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that the Advisory Board for the Research Councils expects to receive the report of this survey around the end of this year. My right hon. Friend and I await with interest the information which is being collected and the ABRC's advice on its implications.

Open University

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current financial position of the Open University in terms of (a) the development of new courses, (b) current course maintenance and updating and (c) research.

Mr. Jackson: The Open University is now conducting a thorough reappraisal of its existing plans and forecasts. Its conclusions are to be discussed with the visiting committee, and the committee will report to my right hon. Friend later in the year.

Medical and Biological Research

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of post-doctoral posts in medical and biological research remain unfilled at present.

Mr. Jackson: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps are being taken by his Department to improve the career structure of post-doctoral researchers in medicine and biology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The terms of individual research contracts and the career structures available to post-doctoral researchers are matters for the employing institutions. The Government are, however, considering the recommendations of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils, contained in "A Strategy for the Science Base" calling for the more explicit management of research manpower in universities.

Research Studentships

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications were received by the Medical Research Council for research studentships; what was the number awarded during the last year for which full figures are available; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Jackson: The MRC receives applications for research studentship places from academic departments and its own establishments; individuals apply to the department or establishment for a place. The following table gives the number of places sought and the numbers awarded:

	Places sought	Places awarded
1979-80	1,010	275
1980-81	1,011	242
1981-82	952	243
1982-83	1,003	283
1983-84	1,059	280
1984-85	1,120	259
1985-86	1,146	184
1986-87	1,212	213

Burnage High School, Manchester

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) of 9 May, Official Report, columns 14-15, if he has now received a copy of the Macdonald report on Burnage high school, Manchester, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has not yet received a copy of the published report from Manchester city council.

Disturbed Children (Research)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those representations he has received concerning his Department's decision to withdraw funding from the proposed research project into children with emotional and behavioural difficulties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: No funds have been withdrawn, because no funds had been committed. The Department had been considering the possibility of commissioning a research project in this field and representations have been received from the three researchers whose proposals had been short-listed for final consideration. Priority is being given to the enquiry into disruptive children chaired by Lord Elton and further consideration will be given to the problems of children with emotional and behavioural difficulties in the light of the outcomes of the report.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not available. Full-time officers are not allowed to accept any post in the management of any society, firm or company which requires attendance at any time during working hours. They should not undertake any outside activity which might impair their usefulness as public servants or conflict with the interests of their department.

Records of such directorships as are held within these rules are not kept.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans as to announce a city technology college for (a) Doncaster, (b) South Yorkshire and (c) Scunthorpe.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are at present no plans to make any such announcements.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 260, he has received any recent representations from Dixons Plc on the site of the proposed city technology college; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has not himself had any contact with Dixons since May 13, but officials have had discussions. Dixons is considering a number of possible locations. It would be premature for me to make a statement while it is doing so. I understand that Dixons has recently emphatically confirmed its commitment to sponsorship of a CTC and its belief in the importance of the programme.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Religious Education

31. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what recent representations the Church Commissioners have received about the role of religious education in Church schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alison: None. The commissioners have no direct responsibility for religious education in Church schools, although they do have some indirect responsibilities through their support for some aspects of higher education.

Property (Restrictions)

32. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what restrictions the Church Commissioners place upon the use of property for which they have responsibility.

33. Mr. Conway: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what restrictions the Church Commissioners place on the use of Church buildings for which they have responsibility.

34. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what restrictions the Church Commissioners place on the use of Church buildings for which they have responsibility.

Mr. Key: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what representations the commissioners have received about the restrictions placed by them on the use of Church buildings for which they have responsibility.

Mr. Alison: The commissioners do not normally carry responsibility for church buildings when they are in use for worship. The restrictions which they place upon the use of property for which they do have responsibility depend upon its nature. For example, when a redundant church is put to another use, restrictive and other covenants are included to safeguard the use and fabric.

Redundant Churches

35. Mr. Gow: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners what account the commissioners take when they are consulted about the future use of redundant churches of the uses to which those buildings have previously been put.

Mr. Alison: Under the Pastoral Measure 1983 the commissioners must be satisfied that an alternative use proposed for a redundant church is "suitable". The commissioners interpret this to mean a use which has planning permission and which is consonant with the former use of the building as a place of worship and also with the building's historic and architectural qualities.

SCOTLAND

Youth Training

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many youth training scheme trainees are currently in employment in the Monklands district; and if he will list the employers with which they are placed together with the number of trainees at each employer.

Mr. Lang: At 16 May 1988, 1,184 young people living in Monklands district were participating in YTS. Of these, 75 have employed status.

Information is not held centrally on placement providers and the number of trainees each has. Such information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the latest figures for male and female unemployment in the Paisley travel-to-work area; and if he will list these in the Official Report.

Mr. Lang: Paisley is contained within the Glasgow travel-to-work area. Figures showing the number of male and female unemployed claimants in the Glasgow travel-to-work area and for the Paisley parliamentary constituencies on 14 April 1988 (the latest date for which information is available) are shown in the table.

	Males	Females
Glasgow travel-to-work area	71,589	26,276
Paisley North Parliamentary Constituency	3,341	1,487
Paisley South Parliamentary Constituency	3,297	1,307

This information is available in the Library.

Cereal Seeds (Testing)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the suitability of testing of the distinctness, uniformity and stability of cereal seeds for use in Scotland being carried out at Cambridge, and if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the recent review of plant variety testing and seed certification systems.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are no agronomic or scientific reasons why seed of new varieties of cereals for production in any part of the United Kingdom should not be tested for distinctness, uniformity and stability at a single suitable location. The testing of all cereal varieties is currently shared between centres at Cambridge and Edinburgh at both of which the work is carried out adequately.

The United Kingdom Agriculture Ministers agreed that the report on the plant variety testing and seed certification systems in the United Kingdom should be published and copies made available for comment by interested organisations. Ministers will decide in the light of those comments what action should be taken on the many recommendations contained in the report.

Health Expenditure

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the projected percentage increases in health expenditure for 1988-89 and 1989-90 as corrected for the gross domestic product deflator.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Provision for the NHS in Scotland in 1988-89 is some £2,451 million. This represents an increase over the provisional outturn for 1987-88 of 0·5 per cent. after allowing for forecast GDP inflation. In 1989-90 expenditure is planned to rise to around £2,560 million, an increase of 0·6 per cent. over and above forecast GDP inflation for that year.

These figures do not take into account the additional £92 million allocated to the health programme in Scotland, as a result of the Government's acceptance of the NHS pay review bodies' recommendations. This will raise the increase for 1988-89 over forecast GDP inflation from 0·5 per cent. to 4·2 per cent.

Mountain Rescue

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding is to be given to mountain rescue teams to replace existing radio equipment following the allocation of second radio frequency to 158·650 megaherz.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Assistance with equipment, including radio equipment, may be given to mountain rescue teams by police authorities, whose expenditure in this respect, provided it complies with established criteria, is eligible for police grant at the rate of 51 per cent. Where appropriate, rescue teams, desirous of moving to the new frequency, may wish to discuss their particular needs with the relevant police force in the first instance.

Chatelherault

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to reply to correspondence from Hamilton district council addressed to the historic buildings section of the Scottish Development Department, relating to a request for comments on the studies about Chatelherault.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Development Department responded to the district council on 16 May 1988.

Council House Sales (Hamilton)

Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to reply to correspondence from Hamilton district council regarding the sale of council-built houses at Barncluith, Hamilton.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Development Department is seeking further information from the council to enable a decision to be reached on the council's proposals.

Prisoners (Drugs)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were (a) the categories and (b) the numbers of industrial doses of drugs administered to members of each prison in Scotland in the latest year for which figures are available.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No records are maintained centrally of the categories or of the number of doses of drugs administered to inmates in Scottish prisons and this information could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Superannuation Benefit

Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether it is his practice to recover an overpayment of superannuation benefit when the overpayment was made as a result of errors on the part of the supperannuation division.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Yes. Irrespective of the reasons for an overpayment of superannuation benefits, recovery is sought but care is always taken to avoid hardship.

Animal Disease Research (Wildy Report)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the recommendations contained in the Wildy report on the future of animal disease research as they affect Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Wildy report to the Agriculture Ministers and the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council reviewed current arrangements for R and D in farm animal diseases and made recommendations on the use of resources in the future. In Scotland it covered work at the Moredun research institute, the Rowett research institute, the veterinary investigation service of Scottish agricultural colleges and the Edinburgh and Glasgow veterinary schools.

The report makes no specific recommendations about the programmes of research in Scotland but the recommendation on the establishment of an overall United Kingdom executive body will need further consideration.

Regional Councils

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future of regional councils.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no specific plans at present affecting the future of regional councils.

Health Boards (Rates)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what percentage of the health budget was spent on rates bills in each health board in the latest year for which figures are available;

(2) what was the total rates bill for each hospital in the latest year for which figures are available;

(3) what was (a) the total rates bill for each health board, in the latest year for which figures are available, and (b) the number of establishments this covers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information is not held centrally on the amount of contributions paid in lieu of rates in relation to individual premises. The following table shows the total of payments made by each health board in 1986-87 in lieu of rates and the proportion which this represents of their gross recurrent expenditure on hospital and community health services.

Rating Reform

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each local authority the revised levels of community charge from April 1989.

Mr. Lang: The levels of community charge for 1989-90 will be set by individual local authorities and will reflect their own spending decisions.

Domestic Rates

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the average domestic rate bill payable per household for 1988-89 in each local authority area in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The table shows estimates of the average domestic rate bill in each local authority area in 1988-89 calculated using the latest data available. The figures do not reflect the rate reduction of 5·6p proposed for Lothian regional council:

Forestry

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the forestry planting in Caithness and Sutherland undertaken by (a) the Forestry Commission and (b) Fountain Forestry has been of broadleaved trees in each year since 1 April 1981; and what proportion of the further planting proposals accepted for grant aid by him in the statement of 25 January will be of native broadleaved trees.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 16 May 1988]: The information for Forestry Commission planting is as follows:

1982	0·5
1983	0·6
1984	0·7
1985	1·2
1986	0·4
1988	5·2

Precise figures in respect of broadleaved planting undertaken by Fountain Forestry are not readily available. However, since the Government's broadleaves policy statement of July 1985, the Forestry Commission requires that all private planting schemes should contain at least 5 per cent. broadleaves, wherever it is practicable to do so.

The planting prescriptions in the cases referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend in his statement of 25 January 1988 allow, on average, for over 5 per cent. broadleaves. Most of these broadleaves will be of native species.

Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the names and areas of those parcels of land which were (a) submitted and (b) approved for forestry grant aid in the Dornoch forest district in 1987-88.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Cash Dispensers

44. Mr. Butler: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he will make an assessment of the practicability of installing a cash dispensing facility within the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Wakeham: I am not aware that there is sufficient demand for such an assessment. The Post Office does, of course, already provide a cheque encashment service for Members and all staff working within the Palace of Westminster.

Press Briefings

45. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Lord President of the Council what accommodation is provided within the House for briefings of the press by (a) the Prime Minister's press secretary and (b) other Government press officers.

Mr. Wakeham: No accommodation is provided in the House specifically for this purpose. The Government information service briefs the parliamentary lobby journalists at their invitation in their room in the Palace of Westminster.

Private Members' Bills

46. Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will take steps further to review the arrangements for the consideration of private Members' Bills; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: No.

Visits

47. Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will review the current arrangements for visits, tours and Gallery tickets for the House with a view to ensuring that Members can arrange a full visit by one telephone call to one Officer of the House.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to his written question on Monday 15 February at column 451.

Abortion (Amendment) Bill

48. Mr. Favell: To ask the Lord President of the Council what representations he has received seeking the provision of additional parliamentary time for proceedings on the Abortion (Amendment) Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: I have received a very large number of letters from members of the general public on this subject, and representations, inside and outside the House, from a number of hon. Members.

Telephones (Cleaning)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will issue advice to every right hon. and hon. Member, member of staff and Officer of the House that they are personally responsible for cleaning their own telephones; and if he will give details of how they can obtain the cleaning sachets provided for this purpose.

Mr. Wakeham: Information concerning the cleaning of telephones and the availability of cleaning materials for this purpose is published periodically in the "All-Party Whip".

Members' Tea Room

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council what instructions have been given to the engineers responsible for the refrigeration unit in the salad bar in the Members' Tea Room to ensure that the temperature meets the basic food requirements.

Mr. Wakeham: That action be taken to adjust its thermostatic control.

Toilets

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council when he intends to provide rubbish bins in each of the ladies' toilets in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Wakeham: Many of the ladies' lavatories are provided with waste bins. I understand that where they do not already exist, the Serjeant at Arms is making arrangements for them to be provided. If the hon. Lady has a particular complaint in mind, may I suggest that in the first instance she writes to the Serjeant at Arms.

Members' Dining Room

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council by what authority it is possible for tables in the Members' Dining Room to be reserved.

Mr. Wakeham: Tables in the Members' Dining Room may not be reserved.

Food Hygiene

Ms. Walley: To ask the Lord President of the Council what advice is available to catering staff in the House on food handling; what percentage and how many of the existing staff have attended food handling courses; and what checks are made to ensure that food handled and cooked at the Palace of Westminster complies with the standards of food hygiene and inspection implemented by environmental health officers in food premises where Crown immunity does not apply.

Mr. Wakeham: Advice to staff on food handling is available from and given as necessary by heads of section and the management of the Refreshment Department. No record is kept of the numbers who have attended food handling courses; but the Department does comply with the standards of hygiene laid down in the Food Hygiene Regulations made under the Food Act 1984.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Laos

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to improve current arrangements for diplomatic representation in Laos; and if he will describe the present arrangements.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) gave to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) on 24 March. Present arrangements work well and we have no plans at present to amend them.

Swiss Law Reports

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the embassy in Berne receives copies of Swiss law reports on commercial cases.

Mrs. Chalker: No, but it is open to British missions to request copies of reports as appropriate.

Disarmament

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has considered the proposal put forward in Stockholm by the six nations initiative leaders for a multilateral verification system within the United Nations; if he will support the proposal at the United Nations special session on disarmament; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We consider that verification is an essential element of any arms control agreement. Verification is most effective when provisons for it are specifically tailored to a particular treaty. Detailed verification arrangements are thus best left to the parties to a treaty. We would therefore question the value of a United Nations verification agency.

Soviet Union

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made in the past six months to the Soviet ambassador concerning violations of human rights in the Soviet Union; and what plans he has for further such representations in the near future.

Mr. Mellor: We take every suitable opportunity to raise human rights violations with the Soviet authorities in Moscow and with the Soviet ambassador here. My right hon. and learned Friend did so during his talks with Mr. Shevardnadze in February. We shall be making further representations during bilateral human rights talks at official level in June.

Nicaragua

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he or one of his Ministers intends to visit Nicaragua.

Mr. Mellor: No ministerial visits to Nicaragua are currently planned.

Military Expenditure

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's response to the proposals of the Warsaw treaty countries for a one or two-year moratorium on the growth of military spending of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and Warsaw treaty states; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: A freeze on the military spending of the two alliances would do nothing to eliminate the conventional imbalance in Europe that so favours the Warsaw pact and which lies at the heart of the region's security problems. Nor would it reduce the proportion of Soviet spending on defence which, according to our estimates, is in the order of 15 per cent. of GNP, as compared to 5 per cent. in the United Kingdom.

Overseas Information Department

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many persons employed in each year in the overseas information department were previously employed in the information research department;

(2) what are the terms of reference of the overseas information department;

(3) how many members of staff are employed by the overseas information department; what are their responsibilities; and what are the department and section titles.

Mr. Mellor: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office overseas information department ceased to exist in 1980. Its terms of reference were to provide guidance and background briefing on matters of general concern affecting Government policies. To research details on an annual basis of the redeployment of former information research department employees would involve disproportionate cost.

Nuclear Materials

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any of the three instances of violations of the declared purpose clause covering the safeguards of nuclear materials under Euratom treaty article 84, cited by Euratom safeguards director Wilhelm Gmelin in evidence before the Bundestag Enquiry Committee into nuclear materials in Bonn on 28 April, referred to nuclear materials in United Kingdom installations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: None of the three violations mentioned by Mr. Gmelin referred to nuclear materials in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to seek an early meeting with his counterpart in the Federal Republic of Germany to initiate a European Economic Community inquiry into the disappearance of nuclear materials in transit between European Economic Community states.

Mr. Mellor: No; the European Commission has already undertaken an investigation into the transfer of nuclear materials within the European Community. In addition, the European Parliament has set up a special committee of inquiry which we expect to report by the end of June.

Coal Imports

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, during the next meeting of European Community Foreign Affairs Ministers, he will raise the matter of coal imports which come originally from South Africa or Namibia but are traded in Holland, Belgium or other European countries and its effects on the United Kingdom's coal mining industry.

Mrs. Chalker: No.

PLO Official (Murder)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to the answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 232, he will specify the information on which Her Majesty's Government base the suspicions of Israeli involvement in the murder of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation official Abu Jihad in Tunis; what attempt Her Majesty's Government have made to establish proof of such Israeli involvement; what weight he attaches in this regard to press briefings by Israeli Government sources acknowledging responsibility; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Israeli spokesmen have neither confirmed nor denied widely reported allegations of Israeli involvement in the murder of Abu Jihad. The Israeli authorities have offered no comment in reply to our own inquiries on this matter.

Information Research Department

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State the hon. Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar), to the hon. Member for Brent, East, on 3 May concerning the information research department.

Mr. Mellor: I am arranging for a copy of my hon. Friend's letter of 3 May to be placed in the Library of the House.

Central America

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what specific measures will be proposed by Her Majesty's Government in the light of the adoption by consensus of United Nations General Assembly resolution A/42/L/49 regarding a special plan of economic co-operation for Central America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: As foreseen in the economic communiqué issued following the San José IV meeting in Hamburg, we shall be discussing with our European partners ways in which the substantial EC aid to the region can be co-ordinated with the objectives of the plan, and with the action of other countries and international organisations which are taking part in this effort. The Community's participation in various specific measures under the plan will be agreed jointly with the countries of the central American isthmus.

Private Security Companies

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what payments have been made by his Department in each year from 1980 to date to Zeus and Lynx private security companies; and what was the nature of the work undertaken by these companies.

Mr. Mellor: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has employed Zeus but not the Lynx security company. Detailed information on this subject is not kept in a centralised form and can only be researched at disproportionate cost. Available records show that Zeus Security Guards Ltd. were employed on access control duties in Whitehall six years ago and on two further occasions in 1983.

Ms. Susan Wescott

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State of Foreign Commonwealth Affairs if he has any information about the arrest of Ms. Susan Wescott, a British passport-holder, by the South African authorities on 8 May near Johannesburg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We are aware of the arrest, together with three other persons, of Mrs. Susan Donnelly (née Wescott) in South Africa on 8 May 1988. Her Majesty's consul at Johannesburg saw her on 16 May. No formal charges have yet been laid. Mrs. Donnelly's brother has engaged a lawyer to represent her.

EMPLOYMENT

Employment Training Programme

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he intends to take to ensure that assessing agents on the employment training programme are aware of any particular needs of people with disabilities.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls: Training agents will be expected to demonstrate that they are able to deliver a full range of assessment and occuptional guidance services completely and professionally. This will include arrangements for participants who have special needs, including disabilities. In addition, the facilities of the employment rehabilitation service will be available to training agents to offer specialist or extended assessment to appropriate participants where the need is identified.

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how long he expects the National Council for Vocational Qualifications to take to complete its task.

Mr. Nicholls: The National Council for Vocational Qualifications was given the target date of 1991 to have the first four levels of its new system fully operational. It is making good progress, but whether it can complete this task by 1991 depends on the response of awarding bodies and employers, in particular on how quickly the leading industry bodies can set the standards on which national vocational qualifications must be based.

Youth Training

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give a breakdown of (a) female enrolment and (b) total enrolment in each youth training scheme course since 1985.

Mr. John Cope: There are currently around 5,000 individual schemes operating in YTS. At the end of March 1988 there were 389,100 young people in training on YTS, of whom 43 per cent. were young women. This proportion of young women has remained constant since 1985.

Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mines and Quarries Act 1954

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he is able to publish the proposed regulations which will replace the Mines and Quarries Act 1954;

(2) whether he is able to publish, in conjunction with the Health and Safety Commission, the codes of practice which are to replace the Mines and Quarries Act 1954.

Mr. Nicholls: Fifteen sets of regulations, each with a supporting approved code of practice, will replace the Mines and Quarries Act 1954 and associated legislation. Five sets of proposed regulations together with the relevant proposed codes of practice have already been published. The subjects to be covered in the programme are:

Administration of Mines and Quarries
*Electricity in Mines
*Electricity in Quarries
Explosives in Coal Mines
Explosives in Miscellaneous Mines
* Explosives in Quarries
Health and Welfare
Machinery
* Mines (Safety of Exit)
Respirable Dust
* Shafts and Winding
Special Hazards
Support
Tips and Structures
Transport
Ventilation and Firedamp Drainage
* Subjects on which proposals have been published.

New Businesses

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many new businesses were started during 1987.

Mr. Cope: I regret that the information requested is not available. However, during 1986, the latest year for which we have figures, there was a net increase of 29,000 businesses registered for VAT.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Lee: Comprehensive information is not available about the number of staff in the Department of Employment group who are also directors or consultants in outside organisations because there is no requirement to report these activities unless there is a real or potential conflict with the Department's business.

Staff who engage in such activities are bound by the general rules of conduct that apply to all civil servants. They must not put their private interests before their duty, engage in activities which might involve a conflict of interest with the Department's business, or use their official position to further their private interests. They are not precluded from receiving remuneration. They are not permitted to accept directorships in any company holding a contract with the Department, except as a Government nominee or with express permission.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cereals

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements his Department is making for estimating the size of the cereals harvest in England and Wales in the current year.

Mr. MacGregor: I made it clear in October last year that, in the light of that year's experience and similar difficulties in 1985, I proposed to give serious consideration as to whether, on balance, we were right to release a harvest estimate before we had the initial results from our farm-based production survey.

Following discussions between my officials and representatives of the cereals industry, I have now decided to end the late August survey of yields in sample parishes and, weather permitting, to bring forward the more reliable cereal production survey so that its provisional results can be published in the last week of September. Further surveys of the level of cereals production will follow in the course of the year.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Portavogie (Health Services)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at which addresses in Portavogie National Health Service general medical practitioners hold their individual clinics; what accommodation facilities are used at each of these locations; and why there are no health and medical clinics in Portavogie.

Mr. Needham: The addresses are 2 and 5a Springfield road. The facilities at each consist of one room for waiting and another for consultation. Baby and chiropody clinics are held in Portavogie technical college and physiotherapy and occupational therapy services are provided on a domiciliary basis when needed.

Irish Teacher's Certificate

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what percentage of student teachers graduated from teacher training colleges with teastas muinteora gaeilge/Irish teacher's certificate in each year of its existence;

(2) why was the teastas muinteora gaeilge/Irish teacher's certificate discontinued.

Dr. Mawhinney: This certificate has not been awarded by Northern Ireland teacher training colleges for at least 40 years.

The required information is not available.

Irish Language

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what qualification the Department of Education recognises as suitable for teaching Irish in primary schools;

(2) why the Ministry of Education ceased to recognise certificates of competence to teach Irish in primary schools issued by voluntary Irish language colleges in Northern Ireland; and if he will reconsider establishing an arrangement whereby voluntary Irish language colleges would issue certificates of competence to teach Irish and the Department would give them full recognition.

Dr. Mawhinney: Recognition as a qualified teacher in primary schools is dependent upon the successful completion of an approved course of teacher training. The award of recognition is not based on a single specific subject.

It is a matter for the individual school authorities when appointing teachers to take account of any relevant specialisms.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what in-service training opportunities are available to primary teachers with no Irish who wish to teach Irish.

Dr. Mawhinney: St. Mary's college is currently offering a part-time BEd in-service degree course with Celtic as a subject option. Proficiency in Irish, while desirable is not a prerequisite for entry to the course.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been spent on the support of Irish in the education system in Northern Ireland in each academic year from 1980 to 1987, inclusive.

Dr. Mawhinney: Details of the cost of supporting any subject in the curriculum, including Irish, are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will produce a discussion document on the role of Irish in the school curriculum; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 16 May 1988]: I have no plans to produce such a document.

Post-16 Education

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any proposals to improve the staying on rate in education after the age of 16 years; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: I have no proposals aimed specifically at improving the staying on rate in Northern Ireland secondary schools which is already significantly higher than the average for schools in England and Wales.

Adult Training Centre, Glasvey

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he now expects to replace the present adult training centre at Glasvey, Ballykelly.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 17 May 1988]: This is a matter for the Western Health and Social Services Board.

I understand that the board is aware of the deficiencies in the accommodation at Glasvey ATC and hopes to provide a new 75-place unit at Limavady as soon as possible.

Road Works, Comber

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the present roadworks at High street, Comber, will be completed; what form of advance notice was given to occupiers in the High street; and if he will make a statement about the proposed Comber bypass.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 17 May 1988]: The roadworks at High street, Comber, are due to be completed by the end of October 1988.

A letter giving details of the scheme and proposed traffic diversion was issued to all affected residents prior to the roadworks commencing.

The proposed Comber bypass extension is included in the Department of the Environment's 6 to 15 years major works programme. The priority of the scheme within the overall programme is currently being reviewed.

Fair Employment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many subscribers there have been in Northern Ireland to the register for equal opportunity employers and organisations for each quarter since 19 June 1986; and how many of such subscribers have been removed from the register each quarter since this date.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 20 April 1988]: The number of subscribers in each quarter is as follows:

Quarter ended	Numbers of subscribers
31 July 1986 (from 19 June 1986 only)	8,112
31 October 1986	8,270
31 January 1987	8,456
31 April 1987	8,667
31 July 1987	8,834
31 October 1987	9,031
31 January 1988	9,218
30 April 1988	9,438

No subscribers have been removed from the register in this period.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number and type of cases referred under the Fair Employment Act (NI) 1976 to the county court, showing the number and type of findings upheld or overturned by the court, and the employers concerned; and if he will place in the Library copies of the judgments in each case.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 20 April 1988]: The tables provide details of cases heard by the county court. It is not normal practice to place judgments in the Library but they may be obtained on request from the county court, Courthouse, Crumlin road, Belfast.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which employers have made a compensatory payment to a complainant under the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Act 1976; what have been the sums involved in each case, the original date of each settlement, the eventual date of payment from 1976 to the present.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 20 April 1988]: This is a matter for the chairman of the Fair Employment Agency. I understand that there have been 39 cases, the details of which are in the table. It would not be in the best interests of the work of the agency to release the names of parties involved in cases under section 24 of the Act.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many complaints under section 24 of the Fair Employment Act (NI) 1976 of unlawful discrimination, the Fair Employment Agency has declined to pursue; and what reasons have been given in each case.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 20 April 1988]: I understand from the chairman of the Fair Employment Agency that the agency has declined to pursue 100 complaints under section 24 of the Fair Employment (NI) Act 1976 for the reasons specified:

	Number
(1) Adjudged frivolous	34
(2) Outside the time limits	48
(3) Outside the scope of the legislation	12
(4) Considered by another statutory body	1
(5) Failure by complainant to provide sufficient information	5

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make available the results of the Fair Employment Agency for Northern Ireland's monitoring of recruitment to the Belfast Telegraph since 1983.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 20 April 1988]: It would not be in the best interests of the work of the Fair Employment Agency to publish full details of the information obtained from its monitoring or recruitment by specific employers, but a summary of such information in respect of the Belfast Telegraph if contained in the 11th annual report of the agency, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Firearms

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of incidents in which firearms, previously in the possession of the security forces have been used by paramilitary groups.

Mr. Viggers [holding answer 26 April 1988]: Weapons formerly in the possession of the security forces which have been stolen or otherwise improperly acquired could well fall into the hands of paramilitary groups and be used for terrorist purposes. However, only if these weapons are subsequently recovered can they be linked forensically with particular acts of terrorism. To provide details of all such cases would involve disproportionate costs and some details may be confidential, but if there are particular cases that the hon. Member has in mind and he could give me the details, I will look into them.

Sexual Assaults

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information is available as to the current investigation by the Royal Ulster Constabulary into alleged sexual assaults on a 13-year-old boy at the Gleneyre and Burnside children's home; what information relating to such alleged assaults was made available to Sir George Terry during his investigation into Kincora and other children's homes in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: The RUC fully investigated allegations of misconduct concerning children in care in Gleneyre and Burnside children's homes, Craigavon. The papers were referred to the Director of Public Prosecutions (Northern Ireland) who directed no prosecution. However, in recent months, following further information received, this inquiry has been reopened and is currently under investigation by the RUC. I cannot comment on the information available to the police in the context of their current investigation.

As far as the information available to Sir George Terry is concerned, I cannot add to what is said in his report (a copy of which is in the Library).

Psychological Warfare

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes there have been in policy on psychological operations and psychological warfare as implemented by the security forces in Northern Ireland from 1979 to the current date.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: It is not the general practice to comment on detailed matters of security policy.

Mr. Fred Holroyd

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary as to why he has refused Mr. Fred Holroyd's request for the return of photographic material supplied by him to the police.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: No. I understand that the RUC has already made its reasons known to Mr. Holroyd.

Kidnapping

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if any members of the security forces have paid civilians to kidnap individuals from the Irish Republic.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: I am not aware of any such payments.

Information Units

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was (a) the role, (b) the composition and (c) the years of operation of (i) the information policy unit, (ii) the information liaison unit, and (iii) the information planning unit, from 1971 to the current date.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: Various groups and committees of officials have met; often on an ad-hoc basis, to co-ordinate the work of the information departments within the security forces and the Northern Ireland Office. Detailed records have not been kept on their role and composition because it was judged neither necessary nor cost effective to do so.

Murder Investigations

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will call for a report from the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary as to the stage at which investigations have reached into the murders of

(a) Royal Ulster Constabulary Sergeant Joseph Campbell in February 1977, (b) Mr. John Francis Green in January 1975 and (c) Mr. John Turnley in 1980, and the shootings of (i) Captain William Black of the Ulster Defence Regiment in 1973, and (ii) the journalist Mr. Jim Campbell in 1984.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: No.

DEFENCE

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many new jobs have been created in the north-west during the last 12 months, as a result of contracts for his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: Estimates of the number of jobs in the north-west related to new contracts placed by MOD in a particular year could not be derived except at disproportionate cost. In 1985/86, about 23,000 people are estimated to have been employed on work for my Department placed with main contractors in the north-west.

British Military Advisory Team (Bangladesh)

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the purpose of the British military advisory team in Bangladesh.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The team assists in the direction and teaching of staff courses for middle ranking officers at the Bangladesh defence services command and staff college in Dhaka.

Tucano

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours have been carried out on the Tucano aircraft.

Mr. Sainsbury: Some 37.5 hours have been flown at the aircraft and armament experimental establishment, Boscombe Down, and some 200 hours have been flown on production aircraft at Short Bros.

United States Aircraft

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the United States very low frequency communication aircraft have ever been used, and are currently being used to provide communications with the United Kindom's Polaris fleet.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No.

Glen Garry Transmitter

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Glen Garry extremely low frequency transmitter in Scotland is expected to be in operation; and if he will make statement on its progress.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is too early to say when the extremely low frequency transmitter at Glen Garry Forest is likely to be in operation. A notice of proposed development will probably not be submitted to the Highland regional council before the autumn and the start of construction work is unlikely before 1990.

Trident

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the new Trident missile submarine programme is being complemented by improvements to the capabilities of existing submarine command, control and communications systems;

(2) if the new Trident missile submarine programme is being complemented by efforts to reduce the vulnerability of elements of the existing submarine command, control and communications system;

(3) if the new Trident submarine programme is being complemented by any new submarine command, control and communications system.

Mr. Sainsbury: Communications system for Trident submarines will be fully effective on its introduction into service in the mid 1990s. I am unable to comment further for reasons of security.

Submarines (Sabotage)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps have been taken to increase manpower available to protect the submarine command, control and communications system from sabotage, in the light of lessons of the Brave Defender exercise in 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Exercise Brave Defender was designed to test the plans for ground defence of vital United Kingdom installations and these have been amended where necessary in the light of post-exercise analysis. For good reasons of security, it is not our practice to discuss the details of such plans.

Fylingdales Early Warning System

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the upgraded ballistic missile early warning system radar at Fylingdales moor will give the United Kingdom more advanced warning of nuclear attack.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The purpose of the modernisation of the ballistic missile early warning system at RAF Fylingdales is not to improve warning time—Official Report, 22 May 1986, columns 263-64—although it may marginally do so.

Military Installations

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those military installations in Wales which are regarded as being support facilities rather than operational military units; and whether his Department has any plans for the closure or privatisation of these facilities.

Mr. Freeman: There are the following support facilities in Wales:

RNADS Milford Haven and Trecwn, where a study has been carried out into the future roles and tasks of the depots. A consultative document will be issued in due course.

RNSD Llangennech where a decision to close the facilities was announced in 1981. Other support facilities are located at HM Mooring and Marine Depot, Pembroke Dock, 39 District Workshop, Bridgend, RAC Sennybridge, ASU Brecon, RAF Sealand or RAF St. Athan. There are no plans for their closure or privatisation.

Aircraft Accidents

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the criteria which objectively determine when an aircraft accident is a major or a minor one.

Mr. Freeman: Damage to aircraft is categorised as follows:

Incidents

(a) Category 1—the damage is repairable on site by established first line personnel.[1]

(b) Category 2—the damage is repairable on site by established second line personnel.[2]

Accidents

(c) Category 3—the damage is repairable on site but is beyond unit technical resources. Assistance from a repair and salvage unit or civilian contractor is required.

(d) Category 4—the damage is not repairable on site. The aircraft must be removed to an established depot or civilian repair organisation.

(e) Category 5—the aircraft is damaged beyond repair or is missing, or, in accordance with current Ministry of Defence policy, is not worth repairing.

A minor accident is defined as one where the aircraft damage is classifed as category 3. A major accident is defined as one where the aircraft damage is either category 4 or 5.

[1] First line personnel conduct before flight, after flight and turnround servicing including minor component changes.

[2] Second line conduct deeper servicing, including major component changes and structural repair.

Rating Reform

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what advice or instructions have been issued to servicemen and their families living in his Department's accommodation in Scotland with regard to the completion of any inquiry form issued by registration officers in connection with the community charge in Scotland;

(2) what advice or instruction has been issued to servicemen and their families living in his Department's accommodation in Scotland with regard to (a) registration under the Abolition of Domestic Rates &c. (Scotland) Act 1987 and (b) payment of a community charge to the relevant local authority.

Mr. Freeman: Service personnel and their families living in public accommodation in Scotland have been instructed to comply with the normal legal requirement to complete community charge registration inquiry forms and return them to registration officers, and advised of their liability to pay the community charge in the area of their sole or main residence.

Educational Institutions

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list and explain the basis on which educational institutions in the United Kingdom and abroad have been in receipt of funding from his Department from 1979 to the current date.

Mr. Sainsbury: The MOD directly funds six defence lectureships at British universities and makes use of university and other higher educational facilities and courses to meet educational and training requirements. The majority of Ministry of Defence expenditure with educational institutions in the United Kingdom is, however, through research agreements and contracts placed on behalf of the defence research establishments. In addition, grants for work of relevance to defence are made under collaborative arrangements with the research councils, and the MOD and the Science and Engineering Research Council co-fund awards to certain students who are jointly supervised by their university and defence research establishments. Involvement with educational institutions overseas is minimal. All activities are in support of the defence programme.

Mr. Colin Wallace

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish in the Official Report the text of the letter from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) to the hon. Member for Brent, East on 18 April, about Mr. Colin Wallace and related matters.

Mr. Freeman: The text of my letter was as follows:

"Thank you for your letter of 22 March. I can confirm that Mr. Wallace was granted a commission as a part-time member of the UDR in the rank of second lieutenant and granted the acting rank of captain with effect from 18 January 1972. His resignation of this commission took effect from 14 November 1975. As an acting captain, he would have been paid as a captain for all military duties carried out with the UDR, would have been entitled to wear the rank badges of a UDR captain, and in the course of his duties would have been addressed by the rank of "Captain"; all this is in accordance with normal Army practice. My reply to your Parliamentary Question of course referred to his substantive rank.

It has not been possible to trace the memorandum to which you refer in your letter, and I cannot therefore comment upon it. There are no records available of what duties Mr. Wallace carried out with the UDR. I understand that Mr. Brian Parker was an Information Officer based at HQ UDR, and that he was responsible to the Commander UDR for public relations and all press matters affecting the UDR.

You ask for assurances on a number of points. I am aware of no evidence whatsoever that explosives were supplied by a member or members of the UDR for the bombings in the Irish Republic on 17 May 1974; or that any serving member or members of the UDR were involved in the murder of John Francis Green or the bombing of a public house in Silverbridge; or that military intelligence personnel have ever supplied weapons or explosives to civilians for unlawful use in Northern Ireland or the Irish Republic; or that Robert Jackson has ever had any connections with military intelligence authorities."

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when a decision was taken to deploy air-launched Cruise missiles on (a) North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and (b) Royal Air Force aircraft.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There are no plans to deploy air-launched cruise missiles (ALCMs) on any aircraft in Europe. ALCMs are deployed on strategic bombers of the United States air force. In his 1985 Montebello implementation proposals, SACEUR called for, inter alia, the deployment of a tactical air to surface missile (TASM); no decisions have yet been taken on how best to meet this requirement.

Security Companies

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what payments have been made by his Department in each year from 1980 to date to Zeus and Lynx private security companies; and what was the nature of the work undertaken by these companies.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am not aware that the MOD has had any dealings with either of the companies quoted.

Military Buildings, Woolwich

Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the progress of his efforts to preserve military buildings of historic interest in the Woolwich area.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 21 April 1988]: The Historic Military Buildings Committee visited Royal Arsenal west and Connaught barracks on 14 January and had useful discussions about the options available for dealing with historic buildings at both sites. It has been decided to dispose of Connaught barracks once the remaining occupants have been relocated, and in formulating plans for disposal we shall be seeking to ensure that the historic interest and character of the site are respected. No decisions have yet been taken about the future location of the directorate general of quality assurance. However, I expect to outline our proposals for the vacant historic buildings at Royal Arsenal West not directly affected by any decision on the future location of the directorate general of quality assurance before the summer recess.

WALES

Rural Housing

1. Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on housing standards in the rural areas of Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: The 1986 Welsh house condition survey shows that there have been significant improvements in the condition of Welsh housing. It does also highlight the problem areas. We will use the survey results to direct resources where they are most needed.

National Museum

16. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what corrective measures have been taken in the light of the 15th report from the Public Accounts Committee, House of Commons Paper No. 38, to ensure that responsibility for securing economy, efficiency and effectiveness in the use of public funds has been discharged in relation to the national museum of Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Measures to ensure the proper discharge of the Department's sponsorship responsibility for the national museum of Wales are being taken as described in the Treasury Minute published on 28 October 1987 (in response to the Fifteenth Report from the Public Accounts Committee). The financial management and policy review has been completed and the consultants' recommendations are in the process of being implemented. Action is also being taken in response to the internal audit report. A revised financial memorandum is now in operation. Corporate planning is being developed. There is close liaison between the Department and the museum on all these matters, and improved monitoring arrangements have been implemented by the Department.

Farming Unions

17. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met representatives of the farming unions in Wales; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Peter Walker: I last met representatives of the National Farmers Union (Wales) on Wednesday 30 March and the Farmers Union of Wales on Tuesday 10 May. A full range of issues of concern to the unions was discussed.

A55 (Signposting)

18. Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policy on signposting on the A55 of tourist attractions in Rhyl and Prestatyn and on the costs and future maintenance of the signs.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: To be eligible for signing from a trunk road an attraction must have over 25,000 visitors a year, be within 20 miles of the nearest junction, have adequate parking and be open for 50 days or more a year. My officials have recently written to Rhuddlan borough council agreeing to signs for Rhyl and Prestatyn at the A55/A525 junction.

It is our policy that the full costs of tourist attraction signs, including on-costs such as maintenance, should be paid by the operators of attractions.

Benefits

19. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment his Department has made of the impact of recent changes in housing benefit and rate rebates on people in Wales who were previously in receipt of a 100 per cent. rate rebate.

Mr. Peter Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that this is primarily a matter for the Secretary of State for Social Services. He has made clear in his recent announcement that the combination of changes in housing benefits and other allowances will mean that overall around nine out of 10 recipients of income-related benefits will have either gained or have no change in their cash benefits.

Housing Waiting Lists

20. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were on local authority housing waiting lists in Wales (a) in 1979 and (b) in 1987.

Mr. Grist: Information on the number of people on housing waiting lists is not available centrally.

Housing Starts

21. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many housing starts were made in the public sector in Wales during the last year for which full figures are available.

Mr. Grist: 1,924 public sector dwellings were started in Wales during 1987.

Manpower Services Commission Training Programme

22. Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many agencies in Wales have so far declared that they will discontinue their agencies under the new Manpower Services Commission training programme which replaces the Manpower Services Commission community programme.

Mr. Peter Walker: Local Manpower Services Commission offices in Wales have recently written to potential training providers in their areas inviting them to indicate by 6 June if they intend to take part in employment training. I understand the initial response has been very favourable but full details will not be available until the consultation is complete.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

23. Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the work to date of the Cardiff Bay development corporation.

Mr. Grist: During its first year the corporation has carried forward further technical, financial and ecological studies on the barrage proposal; it has also undertaken some significant environmental projects, commenced on a programme of acquiring strategically important land and buildings, and completed a study of the strategy for regenerating its designated area. That study will be the subject of extensive local consultation. A copy of the consultants' report will shortly be placed in the Library of the House.

Sheep

24. Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he discussed the state of the sheep sector in Wales during his recent meeting with representatives of the Farmers Union of Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. When I last met representatives of the Farmers Union of Wales we discussed a wide range of agricultural matters including the state of the sheep sector.

Housing

25. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on housing conditions in (a) Cynon Valley and (b) Wales as a whole.

Mr. Grist: The findings of our 1986 Welsh house condition survey show that significant improvements have been made in the condition of the Welsh housing stock but in a few areas much remains to be done. The Cynon Valley stands out as having a large proportion of unfit dwellings, many of which are in need of major repairs. I am disappointed that the significant improvements made in some other areas have not been mirrored in the Cynon Valley. I am, however, pleased that the borough council has now accepted the need for a strategic approach and has published a housing strategy. My officials are to meet the authority shortly and will discuss the approach they propose.

Central Electricity Generating Board

26. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he next hopes to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board; and what matters he hopes to discuss.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have no plans at present to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board although I am, of course, in touch with the board about its plans as these affect the Principality.

Planning Appeals

27. Sir Raymond Gower: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average time required for decisions in planning appeals; and what progress has been made in reducing the time taken over such appeals, during the past 12 months.

Mr. Grist: In the month of March 1988 inspectors' decisions were issued on 17 appeals which went to inquiry and 68 dealt with by the written method. Median times for these were 32 weeks and 19 weeks, respectively. For March 1987 the comparable figures were nine inquiry cases and 57 written representation cases with medians of 33 weeks and 22 weeks. Average times are not recorded by the Department.

Council House Building

Mr. Holland: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure on local authority housebuilding for Wales for each year since, and including, 1979 to 1987 in terms of (i) current prices, (ii) 1986 prices and (iii) share of gross domestic product.

Mr. Grist: Estimated capital expenditure outturn on housebuilding by Welsh local authorities is available only for the years shown:

	1981-82	1983-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Current prices £ million	41·375	38·357	44·849	32·827	23·750	22·038
1985-86 prices £ million	51·348	44·440	49·627	34·788	23·750	21·341
£ percentage share of United Kingdom gross domestic product	0·019	0·016	0·017	0·012	0·008	0·007

Windscale Fire

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what estimates he has of the numbers of people to have developed acute myeloid leukaemia in the counties of Gwynedd and Clwyd as a likely consequence of the effects of the Windscale fire of 1957; and if he will make a statement:

(2) what work has been carried out to ascertain the effects on the health of the population of north Wales of the Windscale fire of 1957; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I am advised that the level of radioactivity in Gwynedd and Clwyd as a result of the 1957 Windscale fire would have been too low to have had any detectable effect on the incidence of myeloid leukaemia in those counties. For this reason no epidemiological studies of the effects of the fire on the health of the population of north Wales have been carried out.

Synthetic Index

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the European Commission concerning the way in which the synthetic index which ranks the regions of Europe in order of their problems is calculated with regard to Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government's view that the synthetic index was flawed has been made clear from the outset and a statement to that effect was made at the regional policy committee meeting in April 1987. In putting forward the Welsh case concerning the review of the structural funds, my officials have made detailed submissions pointing to the shortcomings of the index.

Integrated Operations Programme

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress is being made with regard to the application by Dyfed, Powys and Gwynedd county councils to the European Community for an integrated operations programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The integrated operations programme for Dyfed, Gwynedd and Powys is under active consideration in the European Commission and I hope that a decision will be reached shortly.

Parliamentary Questions (Holding Answers)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many holding answers have been given to parliamentary questions for priority written answer to the Welsh Office since 25 April.

Mr. Peter Walker: Thirty-one.

Greencroft Hostel, Deeside

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the proposed closure of Greencroft hostel, Deeside, Clwyd, for the mentally handicapped; if he will meet the parent membership of Mencap, Deeside to discuss with them the care of their sons and daughters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The hostel is the responsibility of the Clwyd social services authority and we have received no representations in respect of it.

Patient Treatment Statistics

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of patient treatment in Welsh hospitals consisted of re-admission in the five years 1982 to 1987.

Mr. Grist: Information on re-admission to National Health Service hospitals and units is available only in the case of mental illness and mental handicap, for which the latest data are given in the following table:

Re-admissions as a percentage of total admissions

Year	Mental illness hospitals or units	Mental handicap hospitals or units
1982	66·5	90·5
1983	68·2	95·6
1984	69·3	95·7
1985	71·1	96·9
1986	73·3	98·2

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether the statistics for hospital patient treatments in Wales includes re-admission of patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Statistics for in-patient treatment in National Health Service hospitals in Wales are collected upon discharge. Consequently the emphasis is on the current diagnosis and treatment and not the previous history of the patient. Data about the number of re-admissions are not collected centrally other than in the specialties of mental illness and mental handicap.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 18 May, whether the £27·41 million for nurses' pay is to be paid out of the existing Welsh Office budget.

Mr. Grist: The resources to be provided to district health authorities to meet the estimated additional costs of the nurses' pay award this year will come from non-recurrent funds made available to the Department from the contingency fund. Provision for future years will be determined in the course of drawing up spending plans for 1989-90 and subsequent years.

Rating Reform

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) of 10 May, Official Report, column 72-3, he will give the average domestic rate bill payable per household for 1988-89 in each local authority area in Wales and the initial safety-netted community charge payable.

Mr. Grist: Illustrative figures are given in the following table. The figures shown for each district area include the county council and community council precepts. Each county figure is the average of the total precepts of all the councils in that county area.

Average domestic rate bill per household and initial safety-netted community charge per adult for each Welsh district 1988-89

(1) These figures are provisional, and will be updated in due course with better information which has now been received from all local authorities. No allowance has been made for the transitional safety-net arrangements. The calculations are based on present needs assessments which are under review.

(2) Average rate bills per household are on a basis comparable with the community charge figures and exclude any use of balances. Households are defined, for this purpose, as domestic hereditaments.

Assisted Consultancies

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many applications have been received from companies in Wales for assisted consultancies under the enterprise initiative.

Mr. Peter Walker: Up to 30 April there had been 230 applications. This amounts to 4·8 per cent. of the total applications from all companies which I am pleased to say is higher than the proportion of VAT registered companies which are in Wales (4·4 per cent.).

Labour Statistics

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what change took place in the numbers of (a) unemployed and (b) employed in Wales in the four years to July 1987.

Mr. Peter Walker [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The available information is as follows:

(Thousands at mid June)

	1984	1985	1986	1987
Unemployed claimants[1]	163	173	174	151
Employees in employment	886	877	861	863
Self employed	144	146	154	148

Source: Department of Employment

[1] Because of a change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics unadjusted figures from February 1986 are not directly comparable with earlier figures.

Latest figures show a further decrease of 11,000 for unemployed claimants (unadjusted, April 1988) an increase of 700 for employees in employment (December 1987).

The current unemployment figure is now the lowest since 1981.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Rating Reform

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will introduce legislation to prohibit any information collected for tax purposes being disclosed to a community charge officer; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: With a few statutory exceptions which would not be relevant in this instance, the Inland Revenue is not permitted, under the law as it now stands, to disclose to a third party information about a taxpayer's affairs without his express consent. The present rule would apply in the case of a community charge officer. My right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce legislation to change this position.

Workplace Nurseries

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider methods of encouraging workplace nursery places.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is for individual employers to decide what child care support is appropriate for their staff.

Self-employed Workers

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) 714 and (b) 715 certificates were issued or refused during 1987 to self-employed workers.

Mr. Lawson: In the 1987 calendar year 232,539 714 exemption certificates were issued and 13,070 applications were refused. 715 vouchers—which must be tendered to contractors in return for gross payment—are issued to those who hold valid exemption certificates. The vouchers come in books of 25 and 415,283 books were issued during 1987.

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether manpower or other constraints impose any limitation on the ability of Inland Revenue officials to deal with the growing number of self-employed workers.

Mr. Lawson: No. The Revenue's resources are decided on a basis which takes account of the growth of the numbers of self employed.

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases in which employed or self-employed status was in dispute came to the attention of Inland Revenue officials in 1987.

Mr. Lawson: The Inland Revenue and Department of Health and Social Security introduced new procedures in April 1987 to help those who were uncertain of their employment status. Each local tax and DHSS office now has a designated officer responsible for advice and decisions on employment status. A decision made by one Department will be accepted by the other provided all the relevant facts were accurately and clearly given at the time and the circumstances remain the same.

Since those new arrangements were introduced the designated officers in tax offices have handled some 15,000 inquiries and decisions on employment status. The number of these cases in which a decision was disputed is not known. Normally any dispute would be resolved in the course of further discussions with the tax office; but if agreement cannot be reached the taxpayer can appeal to the general commissioners (the independent local appeal body). During the same period only 22 cases directly involving employment status disputes were heard by the general commissioners.

Schedule D Accounts

Mr. David Howell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made with the computerisation of Inland Revenue schedule D accounts.

Mr. Lawson: Computerisation of schedule D assessing was introduced by the Inland Revenue in two of its 15 regions in April 1987. This proved to be a successful pilot exercise and in April of this year, on schedule, the system was introduced nationally.

External Financing

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a copy of the 1981 Ryrie guidelines on external financing by nationalised industries and similar organisations.

Mr. Major: The Ryrie rules are an appendix to the Treasury paper entitled "Private Finance in Public Expenditure" which I placed in the Library of the House on 18 February. (Official Report, column 724 refers).

Building Societies

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the number of (a) registered building societies and (b) building societies authorised to accept shares and deposits at the end of 1985, 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Lilley: The following table shows the number of building societies registered and the number of those societies which are also authorised in the United Kingdom at the end of the years shown.

	1985	1986	1987
Number of Building Societies:
Registered	171	151	137
Authorised to accept shares and deposits	153	137	124

Government Expenditure

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the share as a percentage of gross domestic product of (a) general Government expenditure and (b) general Government expenditure on goods and services in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Major: The following table shows general Government expenditure and general Government expenditure on goods and services as a percentage of gross domestic product:

	Percentage
	1985-86	1986-87
General Government expenditure	43¾	42¾
General Government expenditure on goods and services	23	22¾

Gross National Product

Miss Lestor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the gross national product for the United Kingdom in 1987.

Mr. Major: Provisional estimates suggest that in 1987 gross national product, at current market prices and based on the average measure, was £419·9 billion.

Central Office of Information

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Government have any plans to allow the Central Office of Information to expand its activities in advertising or otherwise publicising Government services, programmes or any other information on BBC radio and television; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I have nothing to add to the answer my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) on 2 December 1987, at column 543, which applies to radio as well as television.

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the number and subject of commercials planned by the Central Office of Information over the period until the end of June.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 18 May 1988]: The number and subject of TV commercials used in Government advertising campaigns is a matter for departmental Ministers, who draw on COI's experience to advise on their publicity requirements.

VAT

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the regulations to implement the VAT annual accounting scheme under section 11(1) of the Finance Act 1987 will be laid before the House.

Mr. Lilley: The Value Added Tax (Annual Accounting) Regulations 1988 have been made by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise on 16 May 1988 and are being laid before the House today, to come into force on 1 July 1988. This follows a consultation exercise with trade and professional bodies initiated by Customs and Excise, which is now complete.

Taxes

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the manner of his reply on 19 April, Official Report, columns 417-18, he will publish a table showing the proportion of gross income paid in income tax, national insurance contributions, domestic rates, and other indirect taxes by (a) a single person, (b) a married couple with one earner and (c) a married man with a non-earning wife and two children, at half, one, one and a half, two, five and 10 times average male earnings in 1988-89; and what were the comparable figures in 1978-79.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 5 May 1988]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 17 May, at columns 423-30.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in the manner of his reply given on 29 February, Official Report, columns 443-45, he will update and publish the table detailing the breakdown on the costs or yields of reinstating the 1978-79 tax regime, taking the 1988-89 tax base.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 5 May 1988]: The information is in the table.

Reductions in income tax liabilities in 1988-89 compared with the indexed 1978-79 tax regime

Source of income tax reduction(−)-increase(+)	Amount £ million
Increase in personal allowances	−5,190
Abolition of reduced rate band	+2,970
Decrease in basic rate	−11,820
Increase in higher rate threshold	−400
Abolition of higher rates above 40 per cent.	−4,410
Abolition of investment income surcharge	−1,140
Total	−20,000

In the table, the effect of each change has been calculated on the assumption that each of the previous changes has already been made. The figures are based on the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes projected to 1988-89 and are therefore provisional.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a distributional analysis of all income tax reductions since 1979 taking the gains to the top 1 per cent., top 2 to 5 per cent., 6 to 10 per cent., top 11 to 20 per cent., top 21 to 30 per cent., top 31 to 50 per cent. and bottom 50 per cent giving the number of tax units for each group, the reduction in income tax for each group compared with 1978-79, and the average per tax unit, in the manner of his reply on 24 July 1987, Official Report, columns 566-67.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 5 May 1988]: The tables show the latest estimates of reductions in income tax liabilities at 1988-89 income levels of the 1988-89 income tax regime compared with an indexed 1978-79 regime. The comparison thus allows for budgetary changes in tax rates, thresholds and allowances but not for any change in the definition of the tax base. The 1978-79 allowances and threshold have been indexed in line with the increase in the retail prices index between December 1977 and December 1987. As child tax allowances were being phased out in 1978-79 they have been excluded from the comparison.

[2] All information is in terms of tax units, ie married couples are counted as one and their incomes combined.
[3] Based on taxpayers expected to pay tax under a revalorised 1978-79 regime.

PAYE (Overpayments)

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he proposes to take to ensure that interest is paid to businesses and organisations whose pay-as-you-earn returns upon checking reveal that overpayments have been made.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 19 May 1988]: Clause 120 of the current Finance Bill proposes amendments to section 203 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 which will pave the way for payment of interest on repayments of pay-as-you-earn tax to employers made more than one year after the end of the tax year concerned. This change will not come into effect until the necessary computer support is in place, which will not be before 1992. A general interest charge on late payments of pay-as-you-earn by employers will be introduced at the same time.

Higher Rate Taxpayers

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of taxpayers liable to tax at the higher rate as a percentage of total taxpayers region by region; and what will be the total tax gain in cash terms for each region.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 19 May 1988]: The latest information available by region relates to 1985-86. In the table, married couples are counted as one unit, members of Her Majesty's forces and the Merchant Navy are excluded, and tax liability is measured before allowing for mortgage interest relief at basic rate given at source.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy with regard to dealing with individuals and bodies in Wales who wish to communicate with his Department through the medium of the Welsh language.

Mr. Peter Brooke [holding answer 20 May 1988]: When the need arises for interpretation or translation from another language the Treasury either uses a member of its own staff proficient in the language concerned or if necessary calls on the specialist resources in other departments, for example the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. However, we are not aware of any occasions so far where it has been necessary to communicate in Welsh.

Firearms

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many firearms have been seized by customs officials annually over the past five years; and how many of these weapons have subsequently been claimed by their owners.

Mr. Peter Lilley [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The number of firearms seized by Customs during the five years 1983 to 1987 are given in the table:

Year	Firearms	Shotguns	Other	Ammunition (Rounds)
1983	1,003	5	122	7,998
1984	172	12	142	14,908
1985	263	19	245	13,069
1986	310	24	317	10,363
1987	215	3	578	11,829

Records of the number of owners subsequently claiming release of seized weapons are only kept at individual ports and airports and could not be collated centrally except at disproportionate cost.

TRANSPORT

Car Phones

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies his Department has made of the road safety factor arising from the use of car phones by drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: None.

We fully recognise the risks involved in using hand-held telephones on the move. That is why the revised "Highway Code" now says hand-held microphones or telephone handsets should not be used when driving.

Legislation places clear responsibility on all drivers to have proper control of their vehicles at all times. Drivers who can afford car telephones, can afford models which do not have to be held.

London Airspace

Mr. Soames: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to how many times in the last year the helilanes into London airspace have been closed without warning to those using them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Civil Aviation Authority says that advance warning is given where possible by means of a notice to airmen (NOTAM). Detailed information for the period 1 January 1988 to 23 April 1988 indicates that advance notice was given in each of the 22 closures that occurred during that period.

A17 (Sutton Bridge)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps have been taken to warn the public about the closure of Sutton bridge on the A17; and whether he will make a statement about the number of times the bridge is to be closed in the future and their duration.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Since refurbishment began in October 1987, advance notice of closures, one-way working, and height restrictions have been given by local weekly and daily press, on local television and radio, and in the motoring press. In the case of the complete closures over two weekends in April, publicity included details of alternative routes. These were also signed for motorists.

Two-way working across the bridge was restored on 22 May. It will be maintained throughout the summer months. An announcement will be made shortly.

It will be necessary to revert to one-way working in the autumn. Complete closures of the bridge from then until the end of the contract may again be needed from time to time. The public will be informed in advance.

In addition, the bridge is closed to road traffic from time to time to permit the passage of vessels to and from the port of Wishbech. These and other short closures associated with the bridge alterations cannot be predicted in advance. Every effort is made to keep inconvenience to motorists and the local public to a minimum.

Motor Cycles (Noise)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what recent representations he has received on noise emissions from motor cycles; and whether he expects to bring forward any further controls;

(2) what recent representations he has received on noise nuisance from motor cycle engines; and whether he has any plans to seek to amend the legislation on pollution as a consequence.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department regularly receives letters about motor cycle noise. Some complain about the nuisance it causes. Few complain that the regulations we propose to introduce will be too stringent.

We are currently consulting interested parties on draft regulations made under the Motor Cycle Noise Act. These will control the quality of replacement silencers and exhaust systems for motor cycles when they are offered for sale.

We are also preparing regulations to implement the stricter noise limits for motor cycles contained in Community directive 87/56/EEC.

King's Cross Inquiry

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give details of the action list submitted by London Underground to the King's Cross inquiry indicating (i) which programmes have been implemented, which planned and which considered, (ii) which of these items had previously been considered prior to that fire and the reasons for non-implementation of that stage and (iii) which items had been suggested prior to the fire by outside bodies as needing action and the source of the suggestion.

Mr. David Mitchell: These are matters for the board of London Regional Transport as falling within its statutory responsibilities.

Settle-Carlisle Railway

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 677-84, whether the offer of a British Rail dowry extends to the Blackburn-Hellifield line; whether running rights over British Rail lines between Hellifield and Settle junction will be granted to any potential purchaser; and whether the use of such facilities has been discussed with British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: These are matters to be negotiated in the first instance between British Rail and any prospective purchaser.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, columns 677-84, how much of the costs of promoting any private Bill required for the private operation of the Blackburn-Hellifield and Settle-Carlisle railways will be met by (a) British Rail and (b) the Exchequer; and what advice he will be giving to prospective purchasers as to the applicability of the Light Railways Act to any future private operation of these railways.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for any private operator to choose which form of statutory authority is most appropriate for the type of operation they have in mind. The cost of any private Bill—if necessary—must fall on its promoters, not on the Exchequer.

EC (Maritime Policy)

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he will be making in relation to European Community maritime policy at the meeting of Ministers on 20 June with respect to the employment of non-European Community nationals in Community flagged-ships, and to the establishment of offshore international ship registers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have no plans to make proposals with respect to these two matters. I would expect there to be proposals from the Commission on this or related issues well in advance of any substantive discussion in the Council.

London Underground (Fires)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report such information as he has on the fires which have taken place on London Underground over the last five years which (a) were not serious and (b) did not require evacuation of passengers; and if he will give details of all other fires.

Mr. David Mitchell: London Underground Ltd. is not required to report every fire to the Department. The statutory reporting order requires fires, which interrupt the operation of the railway for more than 30 minutes, to be reported.

Reportable Fires on the London Underground

	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988 (May)
Station and tunnel fires	3	2(2)	11(6)	10(5)	10(7)	11(1)
Train fires	1	1(1)	—	—	1(1)	—

The figures in brackets denote the incidents where it was reported that passengers were evacuated.

Fishing Vessels (Safety)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department submitted its report to the International Maritime Organisation on stability, load lines and fishing vessel safety; and if he will place a copy in the Library, together with any response which has been received.

Mr. David Mitchell: 13 April 1988, assuming that the report referred to is the information paper submitted to the maritime safety committee concerning the residual damage stability of passenger ships. A copy of that document has been placed in the Library in response to the question from the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 19 May 1988, at columns 524-25. The report of the maritime safety committee has not yet been published, but a copy will be placed in the Library when it is available.

Ferries (Safety)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many roll-on/roll-off ferries failed the stability test specified in his Department's report to the International Maritime Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report the study on international safety standards on roll-on/roll-off cross-Channel ferries carried out at the request of the International Maritime Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 19 May 1988, at columns 524-25.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he has made any changes to the inspection and survey of passenger ferries as a result of the P and O dispute;

(2) if he has made any changes in the process certifying seamen as competent with respect to safety procedures on passenger ferries during the P and O dispute.

Mr. David Mitchell: The answer to both questions is no.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received concerning the ability of current roll-on/roll-off ferry design to meet the passenger ship safety regulations with respect to evacuation of passengers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: None, but one organisation has questioned the possibility that passengers may not be safely evacuated in a very short time. We have commissioned a research programme to look into additional escape arrangements from roll-on/roll-off passenger ships.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the statement of the Royal Institution of Naval Architects on the safety and vulnerability on roll-on/roll-off ships of 21 March.

Mr. David Mitchell: My noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for Aviation and Shipping met representatives of the institution, including their president, on 21 March to discuss their proposals to improve the safety of ro/ro ships. There was a great deal of common ground and indeed the research programme into possible fundamental design improvements that will be undertaken by my Department includes an investigation of basic design changes as suggested by the Royal Institution of Naval Architects.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to implement the safety standards requested by the International Maritime Organisation on cross-Channel roll-on/roll-off ferries.

Mr. David Mitchell: Regulations are already in force that implement the improved safety standards for ro/ro passenger ships that were recently adopted by the International Maritime Organisation and which will come into effect internationally from 1989.

Marine Surveyors

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the number of marine surveyors in his Department; and what were the comparable figures over the last five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information is as follows:

Marine surveyors in post

	Number
1988	208
1987	233
1986	246
1985	264
1984	279
1983	281

The number of ships of over 500 gross tons on the United Kingdom register decreased from 866 in 1983 to 509 in 1987 (the latest figure available). Since 1983 the ratio of marine surveyors to merchant ships of this size has increased.

Air Miss (Birmingham)

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement concerning the near miss in the flight path into Birmingham airport on the afternoon of Wednesday, 18 May, involving two aircraft at approximately the same altitude and at a short distance apart laterally.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I understand from the Civil Aviation Authority that the incident occurred 3 miles east ot Warwick at about 5,000ft and involved two British Airways BAC1-11 aircraft, one descending into and the other departing from Birmingham airport. Full details are not yet known. It appears that the aircraft were separated by about a quarter of a mile laterally and no avoiding action was taken.

The incident will be investigated by the independent joint airmiss working group. The report will be published. It will be the responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority to take any necessary safety action; this need not wait until the report is published.

A40 (Improvement)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedure for conducting cost-benefit analysis of an on-line solution was adopted by his Department when considering the Western avenue A40 junction improvement at Long lane, Hillingdon; and if he will place details in the Library.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [holding answer 20 May 1988]: Both the Department's published scheme and the on-line alternative, which was put forward at the public inquiry into the proposals, were evaluated using COBA9, a computer-based system for the cost-benefit analysis of road schemes. Copies of relevant documents from the public inquiry are being placed in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

Unfit Houses (Compensation)

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to review the Land Compensation Act 1973 in general and the code for site value compensation in particular.

Mr. Waldegrave: In the normal course of business we monitor the operation of the Land Compensation Act 1973. We recognise that the present arrangements under the Housing Act 1985 providing compensation for the compulsory acquisition of unfit houses, currently payable at site value, can give rise to anomalies and we intend to introduce legislation as soon as possible to provide for full market value compensation to all house owners.

Inward Migration (South-East)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is his Department's latest forecast, based on the Serplan forecasts, for net inward migration to the south-east region, excluding London, in the last decade of the 20th century;

(2) what has been the level of net inward migration to the south-east region, excluding London, in the periods 1957 to 1967, 1967 to 1977 and 1977 to 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: The available information is as follows:

In the years for which information is available net migration from London into the rest of the south-east more than accounted for the net migration into the area. Migration between the south-east excluding London and areas outside the south-east shows net outflows as follows:

Property Services Agency

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many acres of public sector freehold land the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the civil estate;

(2) how many acres of leasehold land the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the public civil estate;

(3) how many square metres of buildings the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the civil freehold estate;

(4) how many square metres of buildings the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in civil leasehold estate with leases of over five years to run;

(5) how many acres of civil freehold land under the Property Services Agency's control are surplus to requirements or are currently not being used for operational purposes;

(6) how many square metres of buildings in the civil freehold estate are surplus to requirements or not currently being used for operational purposes;

(7) how many square metres of buildings are surplus to requirements or not being used for operational purposes in the Property Services Agency's civil leasehold estate.

Mr. Chope: The following statistical table shows the position at 31 March 1988:

	Total	Surplus
Land
Freehold[1]	24,959 acres	201 acres[3]
Leasehold[1]	762 acres	—
Buildings
Freehold	6·026 million square metres	144,000 square metres[3] (2·4 per cent.)
Leasehold[2]	4·103 million square metres	58,000 square metres (1·4 per cent.)

[1] Includes area of land covered by buildings.

[2] Buildings with leases of over five years to run.

[3] Includes land and buildings currently being disposed of as well as property currently not being used for operational purposes.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many acres of freehold land the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the Government's military estate;

(2) how many square metres of buildings the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the military freehold estate;

(3) how many square metres of buildings the Property Services Agency has responsibility for in the military leasehold estate with buildings with leases of more than five years to run;

(4) how many acres of freehold land are surplus to requirements or not being used for operational purposes in the Property Services Agency's military estate;

(5) how many square metres of freehold buildings are surplus to requirements or not being used for operational purposes in the Property Services Agency's military estate.

Mr. Chope: Management responsibility for the Government's military estate is divided between the Ministry of Defence, which owns it, and the Property Services Agency, which acts as MOD's agent and adviser in its day-to-day management. As at 31 March there were 554,012 acres of freehold land on the defence estate in the United Kingdom of which 4,022 acres were surplus to defence requirements and with PSA for disposal. A great deal of information about buildings on the freehold and leasehold estate is held locally but could not be collated centrally other than at disproportionate cost. The responsibility for any land and buildings which may not be being used for operational purposes lies with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many sq m of central London offices are occupied for public sector purposes within the Property Services Agency's leasehold and freehold estate;

(2) how many sq m of central London offices, leasehold and freehold, were occupied by Government Departments and other public sector bodies within the property Services Agency estate in 1979.

Mr. Chope: Approximately 1.6 million sq m of office space are currently occupied for public sector purposes within the PSA's estate in the following central London postal districts: WC1 and 2, W1, SW1, SE1 and EC1-4. Equivalent figures for these postal districts are not available for 1979. As a comparison, however, the total amount of office space occupied in Greater London as a whole in 1979 was 2.9 million sq m compared with 2.2 million sq m today.

Floor Space (London)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average floor space per civil servant in the central London estate, and what information he has on the average floor space per employee in the London financial district.

Mr. Chope: Information on the average floor space per civil servant in central London is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost. For Greater London as a whole the total floor space in offices on PSA's estate works out at an average of 18.8 sq m per non-industrial civil servant. No information is held on the average space per employee in the London financial district.

Water Supply

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the number of disconnections carried out in each of the last five years in the Thames water authority area.

Mr. Moynihan: The table shows the number of disconnections carried out by the Thames water authority for non-payment of bills in each of the last five years. The Department does not hold statistics for disconnections on other grounds, or for disconnections carried out by statutory water companies.

Year	Number
1983-84	1,794
1984-85	992
1985-86	255
1986-87	599
1987-88	1,819

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has any information about the dangers of water contamination by pesticides; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Water undertakers have been asked to monitor water supplies for pesticides which are regularly used in their area. I am not aware of any public water supplies containing traces of pesticides at levels which would constitute a health risk.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of all types of test carried out to detect contamination and pollution of water supplies, including the frequency of the tests.

Mr. Moynihan: Water undertakers test public water supplies at treatment works, service reservoirs, in the distribution system and at consumers' taps. They test for the parameters in the following list, some of which are contaminants. They also test for other substances if there is any suspicion of contamination. The frequency of the tests varies according to the parameter and the situation but is usually considerably greater than the minimum frequencies laid down in the EC directive relating to the quality of water intended for human consumption. In no case is the frequency less than the minimum specified in the directive.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on consumer choice with regard to fixed charges or metering of water supplies.

Mr. Moynihan: At present all water authorities and companies operate a meter option scheme, whereby customers can choose to pay to have a meter installed, and so be charged by measure rather than by rateable value. Following the abolition of domestic rateable values it will be for each water undertaker to decide how to charge customers at present assessed on RVs for their water services, including whether customers should have the choice of being metered.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the costs involved (a) to the relevant authority, and (b) to the consumer, in the current water metering trials.

Mr. Moynihan: One of the objectives of the metering trials is to obtain information on the cost of installing and reading meters in an area, rather than in individual properties. So it is not yet possible to provide reliable estimates of the cost of each proposed trial, the details of which have yet to be submitted for consideration by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State under section 4 of the Public Utilities Transfers and Water Charges Act 1988. However, preliminary estimates by the water undertakers concerned suggest that the cost of the proposed large scale trial on the Isle of Wight may be in the region of about £9 million and each of the 10 smaller trials between £200,000 to £600,000, depending on the location of the meters and the equipment to be used. These costs are in addition to the cost of some preliminary work in the trial areas on monitoring overall consumption for which the Government agreed to pay last year.

The Government have also agreed to contribute 50 per cent. of the approved costs of the proposed trial on the Isle of Wight and the ten smaller trials, together forming a co-ordinated programme prepared by the water industry. The remaining share of the costs of the trials will be spread across the generality of each water undertaker's consumers, not only those consumers in the trial areas.

Local Authorities (Grant-aid)

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much grant-aid has been given to each local authority in Staffordshire since 1982 under the development land grant and associated programmes.

Mr. Trippier: The amounts of derelict land grant paid to individual local authorities in Staffordshire since 1982 are given in the following table. Figures are not yet available for 1988-89.

No grant-aid has been given to the authorities under the urban development grant or urban regeneration grant.

Water Privatisation

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the chairman of the Water Companies Association to discuss the privatisation of the water industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 20 April 1988, at column 489.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from parties with an interest in fresh water angling with regard to the privatisation of the water industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: In response to the consultation paper on the National Rivers Authority issued in July 1987, we received comments from the following bodies:

National Anglers Council
Institute of Fisheries Management
Wye Salmon Fishery Owners Association
National Association of Specialist Anglers
Hereford and District Angling Association
Dee Fishery Association
Commercial Fisheries Association
Welsh Salmon and Trout Association
Tamar and Tributaries Fisheries Association
United Usk Fishermen Association
Wear and Tees Fisheries Consultative Association
Atlantic Salmon Trust
The Angling Foundation
Sussex Anglers Consultative Committee
Carmarthenshire Fisheries Federation
River Ouse Fisheries Consultative Association
Thames Fisheries Consultative Council
Salmon and Trout Association
Welsh Anglers Council
Welsh Federation of Coarse Anglers

Since the end of the consultation period we have received a number of further representations and I have met representatives of the National Anglers Council and the Leicestershire Angling Federation. The vast majority of these organisations have supported our proposal to create a National Rivers Authority with responsibility for fisheries management.

Storm Sewers

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate his Department has made of the cost of repairing storm sewers in each water authority area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I do not have the information on which to base an estimate.

Water Authorities

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the effect of switching from historic cost accounting to current cost accounting on profit targets set by the Government for each water authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Profit targets for water authorities have been set in current cost terms since their introduction in 1981-82.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the currently estimated value of the assets of each water authority; what was the figure during the financial year 1983-84; what it will be in 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Figures for assets for 1981-82 to 1986-87 are published in the water authorities' accounts for 1986-87. The figures for 1987-88 will be available shortly when the 1987-88 accounts are placed before Parliament. Figures for later years are not available.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current income of each water authority from sources other than water rates; what is the current expenditure of each on assets not directly connected with the maintenance of the water supply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested by the hon. Member is published in the water authorities' annual accounts which are laid before Parliament. The 1987-88 account will be available shortly.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent by each English water authority in 1987-88 on (a) water quality regulation, (b) water resources, (c) water supply, (d) land drainage and flood protection, (e) recreation, amenities, fisheries and navigation, and (f) sewage collection, treatment and disposal.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested by the hon. Member will be published in the annual accounts of the water authorities, which will be laid before Parliament in July.

Water Pipes (Corrosion)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has, for each water authority, as to the approximate number of homes supplied through piping which suffers from what the relevant water authority considers an unacceptable level of corrosion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not held centrally.

Lost Water

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has for each water authority for each year since 1980, as to the percentage of water which enters the mains pipes which is lost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not held centrally.

Planning Permissions

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will instigate an inquiry into the number of cases where the granting of agricultural licences has been followed by granting of planning permission for dwellings in the green belt areas; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many planning permissions for dwellings were given to owners of agricultural smallholdings in the years 1986-87 and 1987-88;

(3) if he will instigate an inquiry into the number of cases where the sale of agricultural holdings has been used to obtain planning permission for a dwelling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Ninety eight per cent. of planning permissions are granted by local planning authorities. Information collected by my Department does not separately identify cases of the kind mentioned in the hon. Member's questions. Existing planning guidance about agricultural dwellings is in the annex to DoE circular 24/73.

Rivers and Lakes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated total length of riverways and total surface area of freshwater lakes administered by each of the English regional water authorities.

Mr. Moynihan: The lengths of rivers administered or controlled by water authorities vary for different functions and responsibilities. For example, the lengths of designated main rivers under the English water authorities' management for the purposes of the Land Drainage Act 1976 are:

Authority	km
Anglian	6,518
Northumbrian	1,459
North West	5,807
Severn Trent	3,548
Southern	2,757
South West	1,465
Thames	5,072
Wessex	2,242
Yorkshire	1,806
TOTAL	30,674

The lengths of rivers surveyed for the purposes of the river quality survey 1985 were:

Authority	km
Anglian	4,328
Northumbrian	2,784
North West	5,323
Severn Trent	5,150
Southern	1,992
South West	2,941
Thames	3,546
Wessex	2,467
Yorkshire	5,767
TOTAL	34,298

Information about the surface areas of freshwater lakes within a particular water authority's area would only be obtainable from the water authority in question.

Housing Associations

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for the role of local authorities in enabling housing associations to provide dwellings in their areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: Under the provisions of the Housing Bill, the Housing Corporation will become the sole channel for the payment of Exchequer grants to housing associations. Last September, in its policy paper "Finance for Housing Associations: The Government's Proposals" the Government said that they considered there were advantages in precluding the payment of housing association grant towards housing association schemes funded by local authorities. In the light of representations made to them, however, the Government have concluded that it would be wrong to deny Exchequer support to schemes promoted in this way. Collaborative working between associations and local authorities is of considerable importance and some authorities have funded associations under long standing arrangements. The Government have therefore decided that the Housing Corporation should be authorised to pay housing association grant on schemes supported by local authority loans. We intend that the entire costs of such schemes should count against local authority housing investment programmes, and my officials will be consulting the local authority associations, the Housing Corporation and the National Federation of Housing Associations on the detailed arrangements.

Greater Manchester Residuary Body

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the Greater Manchester residuary body to be wound up and the assets and liabilities transferred to the metropolitan boroughs.

Mr. Chope: I expect the Greater Manchester residuary body to be wound up well within the five-year period allotted for the completion of its task.

Grant-related Expenditure

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total rateable value grant-related expenditure assessment from 1981-82, population, total expenditure and rateable value per head, in total, for local authorities in each economic planning region, showing separately Greater London, inner London and outer London in each year from 1979-80 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Chope: The following tables list the data requested for each year from 1981-82 to 1988-89: comparable data are not available for the period before the introduction of the present rate support grant system in 1981-82.

Note: London-wide authorities, such as the Metropolitan police, mean that it is not possible to produce total GRE and total expenditure figures for inner and outer London separately.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of local authorities which spent, respectively, above or below (a) their grant-related expenditure assessment and (b) any expenditure target set in each year from 1981-82 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Chope: The table lists the number of authorities in each of the categories requested:

Number of local authorities spending	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89

below target	46	166	213	175	166	n/a	n/a	n/a

Notes

1. All expenditure figures are those used in the latest supplementary report for the relevant year, or for recent years the figures used for grant payment purposes.
2. In calculation whether an authority spent above or below the expenditure guidance (or target) issued to it, no account has been taken of any amounts or descriptions of total expenditure disregarded for the purpose of calculating liability to grant abatement ("holdback").
3. For 1986-87 and later years no expenditure targets were set.

Council House Building

Mr. Holland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of council house building in (a) England and Wales excluding Greater London, (b) Greater London and (c) Scotland was represented by (i) public direct labour schemes and (ii) private contractors' schemes in 1985, 1986 and 1987, respectively.

Mrs. Roe: Following is available information which is about construction output in new housing for the public sector including council housing.

New public sector housing: construction output Great Britain

	1985	1986	1987
£ million (current prices)	918	842	932
of which: direct labour (%)	3·8	3·9	3·4
contractors (%)	96·2	96·1	96·6

Reliable estimates for sub-divisions of Great Britain are not available.

Mr. Holland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure on local authority housebuilding for 1986-87 in terms of (i) current prices, (ii) 1986 prices and (iii) share of gross domestic product.

Mrs. Roe: Capital expenditure on house building by English local authorities in 1986-87 is estimated to have been £493 millions (0·13 per cent of GDP) and equivalent to £477 millions at 1985-86 prices. The figure for 1985-86 given in reply to the hon. Member in March 1987 has since been revised to £579 million in current (1985-86) prices, still 0·16 per cent. of GDP.

Walker Park Project, Newcastle

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution his Department has made towards the funding of the Walker park project in Newcastle; and whether Newcastle city council has advised him of who has been invited to open it.

Mr. Trippier: I understand that Newcastle city council has invited the right hon. Member, the Leader of the Opposition, to be the principal guest at the ceremony to commemorate the centenary of Walker park and the completion of the project to improve its facilities. I am glad to see him supporting a project which has received approval for urban programme grant of £942,000, to which my Department has contributed £634,500 for capital expenditure and £72,000 for revenue expenditure as against £211,500 capital and £24,000 revenue from the local authority.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil servants in his Department and the Property Services Agency are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Ridley: The following non-executive directorships of outside bodies have been arranged for officers of the Department of the Environment and the Property Services Agency:

	Number
(i) public limited companies and companies limited by guarantee	14
(ii) building societies	2

No consultancies have been arranged in this way.

For the most part these appointments are unpaid. Any fees which are paid are passed directly into public funds.

Rents (West Yorkshire)

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many applications were made to the rent officer in West Yorkshire to have rents registered over the last eight years.

Mrs. Roe: Figures are available only from 1981. The information for 1981-87 is as follows:

Year	Number
1981	16,150
1982	14,408
1983	22,169
1984	15,799
1985	21,198
1986	16,984
1987	19,705

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the percentage rises in rents as recommended by the rent officer for West Yorkshire for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Roe: The mix of properties for which rents are registered varies from year to year for a number of reasons; for example, the extension of decontrol in 1981 and the reduction from three to two years in the minimum period for re-registration which led to re-registrations in 1983 of rents previously registered in both 1980 and 1981. Estimates of percentage rises are best derived from previous and new registered rents for private regulated tenancies where there has been no material change in terms or in the physical condition. For rents in West Yorkshire fixed in each year, the estimated increases are:

Year of registration	Annualised per cent. increase
1979	12
1980	13
1981	14
1982	14
1983	13
1984	10
1985	8
1986	9
1987	9

Government Cars (Lead-free Petrol)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has issued to ensure that all ministerial cars run on lead-free petrol; and if he will list all ministerial and departmental cars, indicating which of those actually use lead-free petrol.

Mr. Chope: It is Government policy to replace all ministerial cars with vehicles capable of running on unleaded petrol as they fall due for replacement. There are currently 21 ministerial cars running exclusively on unleaded fuel, three of which are allocated to the Department of the Environment.

The Crown Suppliers (a trading fund of the Department of the Environment) operates approximately 4,400 vehicles which are hired to Government Departments and public sector organisations. Of these some 2,250 can either run now or can be adapted to run on lead free petrol where this is available.

Rates (Non-payment)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of summonses issued and the number of prosecutions that have taken place for the non-payment of the general rate in each of the rating authorities for each year since 1983.

Mr. Chope: Information on the number of summonses issued by local authorities and the number leading to further enforcement action, is contained in the annual rate collection statistics published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, copies of which are available in the Library.

Farm Buildings (Conversion Programme)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has of disturbance of bird nesting sites as a result of the conversion of farm buildings under programmes run by the Rural Development Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand that neither the Rural Development Commission nor the Nature Conservancy Council is aware of any evidence of bird nesting sites being disturbed as a result of conversions grant-aided by the commission. However the Department have asked the Commission to bear this possibility in mind for the future.

Rating Reform

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what minimum payment of the community charge, including community water charge, would have been payable by pensioners on basic retirement pension income in the current financial year, for each local authority; if he will express each sum payable as a percentage of the total community charge in that area; and if he will make a statement about the average proportion of the community charge which will have to be met by those on low incomes.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 16 May 1988]: In all cases pensioners wholly reliant on state pensions will be eligible for 80 per cent. reductions in their community charges. The amounts payable in each local authority area in England are, therefore, 20 per cent. of the illustrative community charge figures published on 27 June 1987. No community water charge will be payable in England.

Flooding (Ealing)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to make money available to those affected in Northolt, Greenford, Hanwell and the Ealing area by recent severe flooding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 18 May 1988]: It is for local authorities to deal with emergencies affecting their area, and local authorities have wider discretionary powers under section 138 of the Local Government Act 1972 to incur expenditure to alleviate the effects of such eventualities. As far as private householders are concerned, flood damage is normally covered by house insurance.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the scheme in the London Docklands Development Corporation area to provide 74 homes for homeless families in Newham under a leasing agreement with the East London housing association will be affected by the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 May 1988]: Newham borough council has applied to my right hon. Friend for an additional capital allocation to cover prescribed expenditure which it proposes to incur in connection with this scheme.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what he expects to be the average delay between submission and decision of schemes under the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations;

(2) how much additional prescribed expenditure allocation will be available for schemes which will now need to be approved under the new Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations;

(3) on what criteria he will be allowing additional capital allocations for schemes which will now have to be approved as a result of the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 May 1988]: The Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations 1988 redefine the circumstances in which acquisitions by local authorities of leasehold interests in land result in the incurring of prescribed expenditure. The regulations do not require my right hon. Friend's consent to such acquisitions to be obtained. My right hon. Friend indicated on 25 April at columns 103-4, certain criteria against which applications for additional capital allocations for particular schemes would be considered. No limit has at present been placed on the amount of such allocations as the criteria imply that schemes for which allocations are granted should be broadly neutral in public expenditure terms. The time taken to deal with applications will depend on their number and on the adequacy of the supporting information provided.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Woodlands estate phase I scheme in West Ham, due to provide 56 homes for the homeless of Newham, will be exempt from the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 May 1988]: I understand that this scheme does not include the leasehold acquisition of land or buildings. It will not therefore be affected by the regulations referred to in the question. My right hon. Friend is considering an application from Newham borough council for an additional capital expenditure allocation to cover prescribed expenditure which the council proposes to incur in connection with this scheme.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a job description for the position of chairman of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee, including hours and conditions of work.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 19 May 1988]: My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Crickhowell has been appointed as the non-executive chairman of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee. The terms of reference of the committee are:

> To advise the Secretaries of State and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the implications for the water authorities of the reorganisation needed to provide a separate organisational structure for their water supply and sewerage functions, and the functions that will be performed by the new National Rivers Authority; and to advise them on the acceptability of the scheme proposed by each Water Authority, and to ensure that it will enable the NRA adequately to fulfil the tasks proposed to be allocated to it.

The remuneration for the chairman's appointment is £40,000 per annum.

I expect that the post will require between two and three days work a week on average.

Lomax Site

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the result of the public inquiry into the Opencast Executive's application to mine the Lomax site in Greater Manchester; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [holding answer 20 May 1988]: My right hon. Friend expects to receive the report on the inquiry into British Coal's proposals for the Lomax site in the very near future. Following consideration of the report he will reach his decision as soon as possible, and the hon. Member will be notified of the decision.

House of Commons (Floor Coverings)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for the carpet in the doorway of the room of the Opposition Chief Whip to be made safe; and if he will take steps to ensure that all floor coverings are in a safe condition.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 17 May 1988]: The work was carried out on Friday 13 May, the earliest opportunity after it was reported, in which the room could be made available to the carpet layers.

The incident demonstrates that the system for reporting requirements for repairs and for carrying them out works adequately and I have no plans to change the present arrangements.

Water Rates

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the average annual cost of water rates and the environmental services component respectively, for the current year and 1987, for each regional water authority in England.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested by the hon. Member relating to 1987-88 is contained in the table. The information for 1988-89 is not yet available.

Palace of Westminster (Toilets)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the reasons for the delay in putting up a notice giving an emergency telephone number to contact in the event of emergency cleaning being required in the gentleman's toilets off the Committee Room Corridor, and all other toilets in the House.

Mr. Chope: Following the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee's resolution on 23 March that the signs should be placed in the lavatories the work has been accepted as a late addition to the Parliamentary Works Offices summer recess works programme. There has been no undue delay.

Lead-free Petrol

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) of 28 March, Official Report, columns 306-7, if he will list by constituency the number of petrol stations currently selling lead-free petrol; and what steps he is taking to encourage a more uniform distribution of such outlets throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. A copy of the latest available list of petrol stations selling unleaded petrol (a total of 713 on 15 February 1988) and a map showing their distribution have been placed in the Library of the House. I understand that the total number of such stations now exceeds 1,000. The distribution of these petrol stations within the United Kingdom is reviewed at meetings of the unleaded petrol group, which I chair.

SOCIAL SERVICES

North West Region

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the amount of Government funding for each year since 1979 to (a) Burnley Pendle and Rossendale health authority and (b) the North West regional health authority (i) in acted amounts, (ii) in real terms at 1988-89 prices and (iii) in real terms at 1988-89 prices based on the National Health Service inflation rate.

Mr. Newton: The table provides the information that is presently available.

Broadmoor Hospital

Mr. Irving: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will provide details of the estimated value of the present Broadmoor hospital site.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available. Consideration will be given to all the special hospital estates, in accordance with the action being taken more widely in the National Health Service.

Community Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details by regional area health authority and by district health authority of the cost of community services for (a) the elderly, (b) the mentally ill, (c) the mentally handicapped and (d) the disabled; and what percentage of this cost was for institutional provision.

Mr. Newton: I regret that information on health authorities' expenditure on community health services is not collected in the form requested.

Nurses

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on recruitment levels at schools of nursing.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply to the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) on 10 May at columns 140-41.

Health Authorities (Costs)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of Health Service costs in Trafford, Sheffield, North Lincolnshire, Wandsworth and West Lancashire health authorities is devoted to the administration of the local service; and what is the proportion of medical to non-medical staff in those health authorities.

Mr. Newton: Such information as is held centrally is in the table. The hon. Member may wish to contact the health authority chairmen concerned for the other details he seeks.

Mental and Physical Handicap Nurses

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many community mental and physical handicap nurses are employed per resident in each health authority in the north-west and in Greater London.

Mr. Newton: Such information as is held centrally is in the table. The hon. Member may wish to get in touch with the RHA chairmen concerned for the remaining details.

Pharmacists

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the current shortfall of hospital pharmacists in hospitals in the United Kingdom; what impact he assesses this as having on patient care; and what measures he proposes in order to alleviate the shortfall;

(2) whether he intends to take steps to bring National Health Service hospital pharmacy service salary levels into line with those applicable in the industrial and retail branches of pharmacy in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: It is for health authorities to decide the levels of staffing within the various staff groups, and details of any shortfalls are therefore not available centrally.

Within the Department the manpower planning advisory group and for Wales the Welsh manpower steering group are undertaking the following projects, looking into a variety of aspects of the role of hospital pharmacists:

1. An attitudinal study among female pharmacists, which has the backing of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain (PSGB).
2. A workshop is to be held in the autumn with pharmacy managers based on the results of this attitudinal study and on the work undertaken by the WMSG. The results of the WMSG are to be made available to the Department.
3. Building on the findings of these two initiatives an in-depth study of hospital pharmacy skill mix is to be undertaken which is likely to commence early 1989.

Pay is a matter for negotiation in the pharmaceutical Whitley council. I understand that the council has agreed a timetable for implementing a more flexible grading structure for hospital pharmacists in the current pay round.

Family Practitioner Committees

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services on what basis the level of funding for each family practitioner committee is decided.

Mr. Newton: Our aim for the past three years has been to reduce the effects of such anomalies as arose from the negotiations in 1984-85 between district health authorities and family practitioner committees (FPCs) to determine the appropriate funds to be transferred to the newly-independent committees. The formula used to achieve this aim has been accepted by FPC interests as the best which could be devised for the purpose and, by agreement, is now regarded as having served this purpose after use in the current financial year.

Overseas Pensioners

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his policy towards the payment of United Kingdom retirement pensions to retired employees of central and local government service overseas;

(2) how many persons formerly employed by the United Kingdom public service overseas are not entitled to a United Kingdom pension; and in which part of the Government service they were employed;

(3) what would be the cost of extending payment of retirement pensions to all retired employees of Her Majesty's Government in both central and local public service overseas.

Mr. Scott: United Kingdom retirement pensions are payable anywhere in the world to anyone who satisfies the contribution and retirement conditions, including retired employees of Her Majesty's Government in central and local government service overseas. No statistics are available to show the number of such employees who are not entitled to a national insurance retirement pension. I am therefore unable to estimate the cost of extending payment of retirement pensions to them, though it would seem inappropriate to extend entitlement to people who do not satisfy the basic conditions.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take in order to resolve the problem of the freezing of British pensions paid to persons living in Australia, Canada and New Zealand.

Mr. Scott: It would have cost about £14·5 million this year to pay the pension uprating to British pensioners living in Australia, Canada and New Zealand and the cost would rise substantially year by year thereafter until all pensions were being paid at full United Kingdom rates. To pay full United Kingdom rates immediately would cost approximately an additional £165 million a year at current rates. In view of these substantial costs, I cannot say when competing priorities will allow the Government to allocate sufficient resources for this purpose, but the question will be kept under review.

Opren

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has as to whether any of the doctors who prescribed Opren to individual patients after its product licence was withdrawn were participating in research programmes sponsored by Eli Lilly;

(2) how many people were given Opren, after its product licence was withdrawn, on a named person basis; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [holding answer 29 April 1988]: Under the Medicines Act 1968, doctors are free to be supplied with and to prescribe any unlicensed drug on a named patient basis if they judge it to be in the patient's best interest. There is no requirement under the Act for any notification of such prescribing so we have no record of how many people may have been given Opren, or how many doctors may have prescribed it on this basis after the licence was surrendered in August 1982. I am aware of a press report of 25 April claiming that under a private agreement with "the research arm of Eli Lilly" a doctor used this freedom to treat patients with Opren on "compassionate grounds" after the licence for the drug had been surrendered. Only Eli Lilly can confirm whether to its knowledge this or any other doctor who may have prescribed Opren after 1982 was at the time participating in a research programme sponsored by it.

AIDS

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost of a test for AIDS.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available centrally other than for the blood transfusion service and the public health laboratory ervice. The cost of testing a blood donation for HIV antibody is estimated as 90p. The estimated average cost of testing by the PHLS is between £3 and £5; this figure is higher because the laboratories' work includes the lower-volume and more expensive confirmatory testing of initial positive tests. Costs of counselling associated with testing would have to be added for tests for people who are concerned they might have been infected.

Mr. William Shelton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of deaths resulting from AIDS which was transmitted heterosexually, for each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Newton: The reported number of deaths in the United Kingdom in each year from 1983 to 1987 from AIDS thought to have been acquired heterosexually is shown in the table. There may have been others, unreported.

Doctors' Contracts

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North of 10 May, Official Report, column 91, he will make it his policy to collect centrally information on the number of doctor's contracts which are (a) whole time and (b) less than whole time.

Mr. Newton: Although we do not collect information centrally on the number of doctors who have applied to have their contracts varied from whole time to less than whole time, we do collect information on the number who hold each type of contract. The latest available information is set out in the table.

[3] Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred.

Community Care

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received regarding the Griffiths report on community care; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received 30 representations from interested individuals and organisations and will take account of them in framing our own proposals.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he proposes to take in the light of the report of the Public Accounts Committee, published on 18 May, relating to community care.

Mr. Newton: We are considering the PAC report on community care developments and will issue our response in due course.

Pensioner Premiums

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether pensioners aged between 60 and 67 years who become sick or disabled after their 60th birthday and who do not qualify for attendance allowance will qualify for the higher pensioner premiums.

Mr. Scott: The higher pensioner premium is automatically payable to an income support claimant who, or whose partner, is aged 80 or over. Other pensioners aged 60 to 79 are eligible for it if they, or their partner, have an invalid carriage, are blind or receive a long-term incapacity or disability benefit: including not only attendance allowance but also mobility allowance, mobility supplement, severe disablement allowance and invalidity pension.

NHS Land

Mr. Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North on 16 November, Official Report, column 441 and 27 November, columns 319-21 and 19 April, column 382, what was the basis in each case on which the figures for the acreage and value of National Health Service land were calculated; and to what factors he attributes the reduction in each.

Mrs. Currie: The figure of £12·7 billion was based on a 1985 valuation by district valuers and was an approximation of the existing use value of the NHS property estate (land and buildings) at that time. The 1987 valuation by district valuers has produced a provisional estimate of £6·8 billion for the open market value of the estate.

Nurses (Education and Training)

Mr. Stokes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on the project 2000 proposals for the reform of nurse education and training.

Mr. Moore: I have today announced our broad acceptance of the United Kingdom Central Council's proposals for major reform of nurse education and training. This entails acceptance of the proposals for a common foundation training between the various nursing specialisms, to be followed by specialist training; a significant reduction in nursing students' rostered contribution to service, without, however, substantially altering the essentially practical orientation of their training; and a move to full student status and replacement of salaries with non-means-tested bursaries. A number of outstanding points remain to be resolved, including the role and training of support staff to nurses and the timetable for the cessation of enrolled nurse training. I hope that further work with the council will enable us to agree a firm timetable as soon as possible.

A copy of the Government's response to the UKCC has been placed in the Library.

Tastrak Plastic

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what contracts, and to what value, have been placed with the university of Bristol for the funding of Tastrak plastic and radiation effects; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: No contracts have been placed concerned specifically with Tastrak which is the trade name of a plastic indicator. This is being used in the study, described in my reply to the hon. Member on 16 May at column 339,to determine the levels of activity present in teeth. The total cost of the study is £24,000.

Windscale (Fire)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what research has been carried out into the effects on the health of the public of the Windscale fire in 1957 and the radiation leaks connected with the fire; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The report of the independent advisory group 1*, established in 1983 to investigate the possible increase incidence of cancer in west Cumbria, was based on evidence of estimated radiation doses to the public from all sources over the period 1951 to 1982. This evidence included the effects of the Windscale fire in 1957. A subsequent report 2*, which reassessed this evidence was produced by the independent committee on medical aspects of radiation in the environment in 1986 and concluded that the substance and essential conclusions of the independent advisory group remained unchanged. Copies of both reports are in the Library.

2* "The implications of the new data on releases from Sellafield in the 1950s for the conclusions of the Report on the Investigation of the Possible Increased Incidence of Cancer in West Cumbria" (HMSO 1986).

Child Allowances

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in a table the child allowances paid to families with one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine and 10 children in each of the European Community member states.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit System in the European Communities (Position at 1 January 1987)", a copy of which is in the Library. Section VIII contains information on child allowances in the European Community member states.

Government Forms (Welsh Language)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services why the letter, "An Important Message for Widows and Pensioners—Now There's An Easier Way to Get Your Pension", (BR 2196) was not sent out in a bilingual form in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Pensioners are identified by our Newcastle computer on the basis of pension number. It is not possible to select recipients in Wales, or in any other place.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many places at present exist in England and Wales in hospital-hostels for chronically mentally ill people; and what plans he has to increase the number of such places.

Mrs. Currie: Statistics on hospital-hostel places are not collected centrally. It is a matter for health authorities to assess their requirements for such provision.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures are being undertaken by his Department to ensure that those chronically mentally ill people who need permanent asylum and care receive adequate care in the community on discharge from hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: It is no part of the Government's policy that chronically mentally ill people who need permanent asylum should be discharged into the community. Where closure of a mental hospital is proposed, alternative district in-patient provision must be available before closure takes place.

GPs (Psychiatry Training)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made by his Department in ensuring a review of general practitioner training in psychiatry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: It is for the appropriate professional bodies, and not the Department, to review the content of training for general practice. Experience in psychiatry is recommended by the General Medical Council which has responsibility for overseeing the content of undergraduate medical education, and features in all undergraduate medical courses. Psychiatry is also an option in the mandatory two years of hospital experience which forms part of vocational training for general practice. Established general practitioners decide how best to keep their knowledge up to date and have access to a wide range of continuing educational courses and activities.

Community Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made on his Department's intentions to train additional community psychiatric nurses; and when he expects the English training board to publish its report on how it hopes to meet the need for such additional nurses.

Mr. Newton: Officials of the Department have had discussions with regional nursing officers and officers of the English National Board (ENB) in regard to the education and training of community psychiatric nurses. The need for flexibility in the provision of clinical courses was stressed, and the hon. Member may wish to note that the English National Board has established a panel to review the curriculum of the current training course 811. The Department is represented by an observer on the panel. The panel will report to the board later this year. In addition, the ENB has approved an increase in the number of centres approved to conduct course 811—from 10 in 1985 to 24 in January 1988. There have also been other developments such as the opportunity to undertake course 811 by distance learning programmes and on a part-time basis which are being evaluated.

Salmonella Food Poisoning

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cases there have been of salmonella food poisoning, and where they have been over the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: About 137,000 cases of salmonella infection including food-borne infection were reported from laboratories in England and Wales between 1977 and 1987. Evidence suggests the greatest proportion of these were outbreaks affecting families in the home. A smaller number of outbreaks were associated with restaurants/ receptions, hospitals and other institutions. The Government acknowledge the problem and studies have identified a number of measures to help deal with it. Of particular importance is the imminent distribution of a trial information leaflet advising the public about good hygienic practice in the domestic kitchen.

Foetal Tissue

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to reply to the questions dealing with the use of foetal tissue in transplantation operations which were tabled for answer on 21 and 22 April by the hon. Members for Pembroke, Hexham (Mr. Amos) and Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin).

Mr. Newton: Shortly.

Hospitals (Private Sector Leasing)

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those health authorities which have leased hospitals to the private sector; and if he will list health authorities known by his Department to be considering such a move.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that information of this kind is not held centrally.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance has been issued to health authorities about the leasing of hospitals to the private sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities are aware of their responsibility to dispose advantageously of their surplus property. But they may grant short leases at the appropriate market rates on property awaiting disposal.

Private Ambulances

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to involve health authorities in the standards achieved by private ambulances so as to bring them into line with other private health services.

Mrs. Currie: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 27 April 1988 at column 179.

Midwives (Refresher Courses)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will ensure that heath authorities meet the total costs for statutory refresher courses for midwives who are holding bank contracts.

Mr. Newton: It is for health authorities to decide in the light of local circumstances whether or not to meet the costs of statutory refresher courses for midwives who are holding bank contracts.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Portillo: I am unable to give precise details of officers in DHSS who are directors or consultants in private industry as comprehensive figures are not available.

The private activities of civil servants are governed by general principles of conduct, laid down centrally. No officers may undertake private activities which impair their usefulness as public servants or are inconsistent with their official role or which conflict with the interests of their Department.

In DHSS, because of the nature of the work, there are additional restrictions. Officers must not undertake private employment with finance companies or with an organisation where there is a likelihood that they would meet and deal with the same people in both their official and private roles. Officers employed on social security work must not deal with a private employer's wage records or with the insurance or benefit side of friendly societies and they are prohibited from holding sub-post masterships. Individuals are also required to seek official permission before undertaking work about which they have any doubts.

Provided that the rules are observed, remuneration is a matter for the officer concerned.

Legionnaires' Disease (Broadcasting House)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what discussions have taken place between his Department and British Broadcasting Corporation management regarding the outbreak of Legionnaires' disease at Broadcasting house;

(2) if he will hold a public inquiry into the causes of the outbreak of Legionnaires disease at BBC Broadcasting house; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief medical officer about the outbreak of Legionnaires' disease at BBC Broadcasting house;

(4) what information he has about the origins and extent of recent outbreaks of Legionnaires' disease at BBC Broadcasting house.

Mrs. Currie: At the beginning of the outbreak an infection control committee was set up comprising the medical officer for environmental health for the City of Westminster, the communicable disease surveillance centre, the public health laboratory service and representatives from the BBC. The Department has been kept very closely in touch with the handling of the outbreak and contacted all doctors and health authorities early this month to help ensure that any possible cases were identified.

Legionella bacteria of the type responsible for the outbreak were found in the BBC cooling tower which was shut down and thoroughly disinfected. Other cooling towers in the area have also been checked.

On Friday 20 May there were 44 confirmed cases of the disease, of whom two have died, and a further 44 suspected cases.

The Department continues to monitor the outbreak closely. I understand a number of investigations by the responsible authority are currently under way.

There are no plans to hold a public inquiry into the outbreak. The committee of inquiry into the outbreak of legionnaires' disease in Stafford in April 1985 made two reports. The second of these, published in December 1987, made general recommendations about measures to reduce the danger of further outbreaks of the disease and the departments concerned, together with other interested bodies, are following up these recommendations.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how long appeals against refusal of attendance allowance are normally taking; and what is the maximum time for which an appeal has been outstanding.

Mr. Portillo: Social security appeal tribunals hear lay questions on attendance allowance; the attendance allowance board reviews decisions on medical questions on this benefit. The national administrative statistics for social security appeal tribunals show that in Great Britain, for the quarter ending 30 September 1987, the latest available figures, the average time taken between the lodgement and hearing of appeals was 35·1 weeks for attendance allowance. While the maximum time for the hearing of such an appeal is not readily available, 27 of the 40 appeals heard in this quarter took 21 weeks or more. I regret that equivalent estimates are not available for reviews by the attendance allowance board.

Low-income Families

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects to publish the latest available figures for the numbers in low-income families.

Mr. Portillo: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Carttiss) on Thursday 19 May 1988 at columns 563-64.

Deaf Children

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking in the light of the report from the National Deaf Children's Society on the failure of certain health authorities to discharge their statutory duty to deaf children under the Education Act 1981, to gather information from all health authorities about their degree of compliance with the Act.

Mr. Scott: The report is currently being studied, and we shall consider what action to take in the light of our conclusions.

Additional Payments (Newham)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the current backlog of claims for additional payments at each of the offices of his Department in the London Borough of Newham; what is the estimated time needed to clear them given the present level of staffing resources; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: There are three local offices in the London borough of Newham. The numbers of claims for single payments of supplementary benefit which were uncleared at 20 May 1988 are given in the table.

	Claims Outstanding
Plaistow	998
Woodgrange Park	425
Canning Town	249

All claims were examined on receipt and priority has been given to urgent cases. Each of the offices concerned has its full complement of staff. At the current rate of clearance it is anticipated that the majority of outstanding claims will have been cleared by the end of July.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will be receiving replies to his questions regarding the working of the special unit of his Department and related matters involving transitional payments over housing benefit and to which a holding answer was given on 12 May.

Mr. Scott: I replied to the hon. Member today.

Benefits

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people under the age of 23 years were in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit and (b) housing benefit at the latest available date; and what were the corresponding figures for 1983 and 1986.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 4 May 1988]: On 31 May 1987, the latest date for which information is available, 738,000 people under the age of 23 years were in receipt of supplementary benefit. The corresponding figures for 1983 and 1986 were 807,000 and 843,000, respectively.

Source: Annual Statistical Enquiries.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are to be made for liaison between the proposed special unit of his Department which will be involved in the transitional arrangements for housing benefit, the local authorities and local offices of his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 9 May 1988]: These details continue to be discussed between the Department and representatives of the local authorities associations.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether claimants will be able to make representations (a) direct to the proposed special unit of his Department or (b) to local offices of his Department if they are dissatisfied with the amount of housing benefit during the transitional arrangements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 9 May 1988]: Although there will be no formal appeal mechanism built into the transitional payment scheme the Department will ensure that when queries about entitlement arise cases are looked at again by staff within the unit.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff will be involved in the proposed special unit of his Department which will be involved in the transitional arrangements for housing benefit.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 9 May 1988]: The number of staff required will be decided in the light of claims received.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services who will be heading the proposed special unit of his Department which will be involved in the transitional arrangements for housing benefit; and what will be his grading for salary purposes and his location.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 9 May 1988]: The grade 6 manager of the transitional payments unit in Glasgow will be Mr. David Bradbury.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to make an oral statement in the House when he has reached a decision on the setting up of the proposed special unit of his Department that will be dealing with the transitional arrangements for housing benefit.

Mr. Scott [holding answer 9 May 1988]: No. Announcements will continue to be made in the normal way.

Cervical Cancer Screening

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average length of training for medical laboratory scientific officers involved with cervical cancer screening.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 18 May 1988]: Because cytology is not recognised as a separate specialty for state registration of medical laboratory scientific officers but is included with histopathology, we have no information on the average length of training. Negotiations are currently under way with the professions supplementary to medicine to define a new training course specifically for cytology. The recommendation for this course is a minimum training period of 12 months in a cytology laboratory during which time at least 3,000 smears should have been examined under supervision.

WALES

Waiting Lists (Gwent)

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what urgent action is now proposed to reduce the waiting lists in Gwent following the meeting with the chairman of Gwent area health authority on 13 May.

Mr. Grist: As I announced yesterday, £1 million has been made available to Welsh health authorities under the hospital waiting times initiative in the current financial year. Of this, Gwent health authority has been offered £225,000 to help tackle waiting list problems in trauma and orthopaedic. In addition, Gwent has recently submitted its revised waiting list action plan and in conjunction with Welsh Office officials, it is actively working on its waiting list problems.

Homeless People

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were classified as homeless in 1979; and what is the most recent figure.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 16 May 1988]: The numbers of persons accepted as homeless during 1979 and 1987 were 12,698 and 13,345 respectively.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were classified as homeless in 1979; and what is the most recent figure, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The number of persons accepted as homeless in districts other than those which are in the valleys initiative area, during 1979 and 1987 were 8,755 and 9,817 respectively. The valley initiative programme launched during 1986 includes the following districts: Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, Cynon Valley, Rhondda, Ogwr, Lliw Valley, Torfaen and Islwyn.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many housing starts there were in 1979; and what is the most recent figure;

(2) how many housing completions there were in 1979; and what is the most recent figure.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 16 May 1988]: A total of 11,426 dwellings were started during 1979 compared with 10,665 during 1987. A total of 11,265 dwellings were completed during 1979 compared with 9,254 during 1987.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses in Wales were built before 1919.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 18 May 1988]: There were 440,000 dwellings in Wales at 31 December 1987 which were built before 1919.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh pensioners are living in houses classified as unfit to live in.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 16 May 1988]: In 1986 there were 46,800 persons of pensionable age in Wales living in dwellings classified as unfit.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh pensioners are living in houses classified as unfit to live in, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 20 May 1988]: In 1986 there were 32,800 persons of pensionable age in Wales excluding the local authorities covered by the valleys initiative, living in dwellings classified as unfit. The valleys initiative programme launched during 1986 includes the following districts: Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, Cynon Valley, Rhondda, Ogwr, Lliw Valley, Torfaen, Islwyn.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many houses in Wales, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative, lack (a) one or more basic amenity, (b) an inside toilet and (c) a fixed bath;

(2) how many houses in Wales are classified as unfit to live in excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 20 May 1988]: In 1986 in Wales, excluding the local authorities covered by the valleys initiative, there were 31,700 dwellings lacking one or more basic amenity, 12,500 dwellings lacking a WC inside the dwelling, 11,000 dwellings lacking a fixed bath or shower and 57,100 dwellings classified as unfit. The valleys initiative launched during 1986 includes all of the following districts: Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, Cynon Valley, Rhondda, Ogwr, Lliw Valley, Torfaen and Islwyn.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses in Wales are classified as being seriously in need of repair, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 20 May 1988]: In 1986 there were 90,300 dwellings in Wales classified as being in serious disrepair (that is, with repair costs of £3,000 or more), excluding the local authorities covered by the valleys initiative. The valleys initiative programme launched during 1986 includes the following districts: Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, Cynon Valley, Rhondda, Ogwr, Lliw Valley, Torfaen and Islwyn.

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many housing starts there were in 1979; and what is the most recent figure, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative;

(2) how many housing completions there were in 1979; and what is the most recent figure, excluding the area covered in the valleys initiative.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The number of dwellings started in the districts other than those which are covered by the valleys initiative area, during 1979 and 1987 were 9,614 and 9,183 respectively. The number of dwellings completed for the same districts and years were 9,496 and 7,848. The valleys initiative launched during 1986 includes all of the following districts: Blaenau Gwent, Merthyr Tydfil, Cynon Valley, Rhondda, Ogwr, Lliw Valley, Torfaen and Islwyn.

Synthetic Index

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how the synthetic index which ranks the regions of Europe in order of the intensity of their problems is calculated with regard to Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The method of calculation of the synthetic index which forms part of the 3rd periodic report published by the European Commission (COM(87)230 final) is described at annex 2.3.1-D of the report. It is applied to level II regions; statistical information is made available by the United Kingdom Government, but the calculation of the index is entirely the responsibility of the Commission.

ENERGY

Electricity (Privatisation)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what amount has been provisionally committed for publicity and advertising purposes in the forthcoming privatisation of the electricity industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: At present no provisional commitments have been made for these purposes.

Oil-based Muds

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to seek to tighten the criteria presently applied for the use of oil-based muds in the North sea.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government are at present seeking to reduce pollution in the North sea by limiting the quantities of oil discharged into the sea associated with cuttings from wells drilled using oil-based muds. On the United Kingdom continental shelf steps are already being taken by the oil industry to reduce the extent of pollution from this source.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Liverpool.

Mr. Parkinson: I visited the Merseyside Council for Voluntary Services on 12 February to show my support for the community insulation project which it sponsors under the community programme. This project, known as "Keep Warm", has now draughtproofed over 2,500 homes of pensioners and low-income households in Liverpool. I was impressed by the enthusiasm of the sponsors of the project, and the success that they have achieved. I have since been in correspondence with the Merseyside Council for Voluntary Services about the points it raised with me during this visit.

North Sea Employees

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the extent to which certain operators in the North sea oblige employees to bear the financial cost of health, safety and survival training for working offshore.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I am aware of only one instance where a contractor in the North sea obliged his employees to bear the financial cost of survival and fire-fighting training courses for working offshore. I understand that the contractor ceased this practice in 1986.

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has on the extent to which certain employees working on North sea oil platforms are not being paid two weeks' leave pay in accordance with the work practice of two weeks off and two weeks on.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I understand that it is not uncommon in the offshore contracting industry for employees to be paid only for the weeks in which they work.

Plutonium (Transport)

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central of 11 May, Official Report, column 110, he will list the agencies other than the police which are to be involved directly or indirectly, in the physical protection of plutonium transported from Sellafield to Japan.

Mr. Michael Spicer: For security reasons it would not be prudent to add to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member on 11 May 1988 at column 110.

PRIME MINISTER

Basingstoke

Q25. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Prime Minister when she last paid an official visit to Basingstoke.

The Prime Minister: I have not recently visited Basingstoke.

Denmark

Q76. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Prime Minister when she next expects to pay an official visit to Denmark.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Land Statistics

Q103. Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will ensure that all Government Departments publish details of vacant, dormant, derelict and underutilised land in their possession.

The Prime Minister: Details of unused and underused land in the ownership of Government Departments in England and Wales are currently entered on the registers of such land maintained by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales. These registers are available for inspection by the public.

Following the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Enviroment on 7 March that public bodies would themselves publish information about unused and underused land they own, similar publication of information by Government Departments is under consideration.

Northern Region

Q125. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Prime Minister when she next expects to pay an official visit to the northern region.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Avon

Q142. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Prime Minister when she next intends to pay an official visit to Avon.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 May.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 May.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 24 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an Audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Procedure Committee

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Lord President of the Council which reports of the Procedure Committee in the 1983-87 Parliament have yet to be debated.

Mr. Wakeham: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 25 April at columns 17-18 and to my hon. Friend, the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) on 30 March at columns 521-24.

Parliamentary Pensions

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Lord President of the Council when the TSRB report on parliamentary pensions is to be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: During the passage of the Parliamentary and other Pensions Act 1987 there was a feeling among some Members of the House that the time had come for a review of certain features of the parliamentary pension scheme. In my written answer of 24 July at column 502, I explained that I had, therefore, invited the TSRB to review aspects of the scheme, the pensions of the Prime Minister, the Speaker and the Lord Chancellor, and ministerial severance pay. The report was published today and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. I would like to thank the review body for the time and effort it has devoted to these issues.

The TSRB recommends revised early retirement arrangements under which a full accrued pension would be payable from a "pensionable age" of between 60 and 65, depending on length of service at the date of leaving the House. When the pension is brought into payment before the pensionable age it would be subject to an abatement, to be calculated on a broadly actuarial basis. The TSRB also recommends that the death in service gratuity should be two years' salary. We will be consulting the trustees of the parliamentary pension scheme on these and the other recommendations affecting the scheme itself, including the suggestion that the holders of the office of Prime Minister and Speaker be allowed to participate in it. Depending on the outcome of those consultations, the Government would expect to lay before the House regulations under the Parliamentary and other Pensions Act 1987.

The remaining recommendations, and that proposing that the Speaker and Prime Minister be allowed to participate in the parliamentary scheme, will require legislation to amend the Parliamentary and other Pensions Acts. We will bring this forward in due course.

We accept the TSRB's recommendations that the holders of the offices of Prime Minister, Speaker and Lord Chancellor should be entitled to pensions of half final salary, that the cap on pensions increases payable to former office holders should be removed and the recommendations on ministerial severance pay. We propose that these arrangements should apply after the necessary Bill has received Royal Assent.

Opposition Parties (Financial Aid)

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Lord President of the Council if his review of the scheme for financial assistance to Opposition parties has been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wakeham: A comprehensive review of the scheme for financial assistance to Opposition parties, or "Short" money, the first since it was introduced in 1975, has now been completed, and I intend to table shortly the necessary motions, embodying a number of proposed changes to the present resolution.

In particular, it is proposed that the existing separate arrangements, which pre-date the introduction of "Short" money, whereby certain office equipment, postal facilities and stationery, are provided for the official Opposition out of departmental Votes shall be brought to an end. The current arrangements for the employment of four officially paid staff in the official Opposition Whips' Office would however, remain unaltered.

It is also proposed, following discussion with the Opposition parties, that certain detailed changes should be made in the accounting procedures for these funds; in particular, that an independently certified statement should in future be made annually on behalf of the entitled parties that the amounts claimed have been expended on purposes in accordance with the resolution of the House.

The review has also taken account of the recommendation made by the Top Salaries Review Body (report No. 24) for a similar "Short-type" scheme to be introduced in the House of Lords. The Government agree, in principle, that such assistance should be provided. Whilst, therefore, it is not proposed to establish a separate scheme for the House of Lords, it will be recommended that the amounts made available under this scheme to Opposition parties should in future be on the understanding that a substantial part of that assistance will be allocated to their work in that House.

In the light of these proposed changes in the scope of the scheme, and the rises in relevant costs since the formula for calculating the amounts payable to entitled parties was last approved by the House, it is proposed that the new annual amounts payable under this scheme shall be based on £2,550 for each seat won by the qualifying party at the last general election plus £5·10 for every 200 votes. This new formula represents a rise of 70 per cent. in the formula approved for the existing scheme in 1985, but is not, of course on a comparable basis. The new arrangement would be backdated to the date of the last general election, and is on the basis that there will be no further rise during this Parliament. It is further proposed that, in so far as the eligibility for assistance under the terms of the existing resolution is related to parties as they stood at the last general election, exceptional provision shall be made for the allocation of financial assistance to the Social and Liberal Democratic party and the present Social Democrat party, relating to their existing parliamentary membership.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Biwaters Project (Malaysia)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs pursuant to his answer of 31 March, Official Report, column 599, whether the Coopers and Lybrand/Sir William Halcrow and Partners value-for-money check contains figures other than Biwaters own published specifications.

Mr. Chris Patten: The value for money study provided a detailed review of costings supplied by the Biwater group and was based on the group's own costings and those of its prospective suppliers and sub-contractors.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Overseas Development Administration, when considering grant/aid for Biwaters' Malaysia project, took into account the findings of the contemporaneous Nigerian inquiry into similar equipment under Mr. Justice Awoniyi.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave her on 26 April at columns 95-96. The Nigerian Government did not accept the recommendations of the commission of inquiry.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the cost comparisons with other plant of similar purpose and capacity contained in the Coopers and Lybrand/Sir William Halcrow and Partners value-for-money check on Biwaters' Malaysia project.

Mr. Chris Patten: No. The report contains commercially confidential information.

Overseas Aid

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the gross public expenditure on overseas aid in 1987.

Mr. Chris Patten: In 1987 gross public expenditure on overseas aid totalled £1,283 million.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Weapons Control (EC Proposal)

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the European Commission's proposal for a directive on the control of the acquisition and possession of weapons (COM (87) 383 FINAL).

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on 14 January at column 352.

Jury Service

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to strengthen the rights of people who because of conscientious objection do not wish to take part in jury service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Lord Chancellor have received a number of representations on this issue and are considering them.

Coach Parking, Westminster

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will request the Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis to consider whether the parking of coaches opposite Parliament and the consequential congestion is consistent with the Sessional Order requiring the passage through the streets to be kept free and open.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am advised by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the parking restrictions prohibit coaches from parking in the area referred to by my hon. Friend, but that they do allow coaches to stop to set down and pick up passengers. Traffic wardens are deployed to prevent coaches from parking and to limit the number of coaches stopping at any one time. The police prevent coaches stopping when this causes difficulties; for example, during lobbies of Parliament.

Tactical Aid Unit (Merseyside)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Merseyside as to the purpose and functions of the tactical aid unit and for the reason for the uniform it adopts while in action; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Merseyside police tactical aid unit comprises police firearms instructors and other officers with experience and expertise in the use of firearms and firearms tactics. The unit provides a small specialist firearms team to deal with operations such as entry and search of premises where the subject is known or believed to be armed; siege situations; armed surveillance in support of the CID; and the destruction of dangerous animals. Members of the unit are routinely engaged on other police duties and are called upon as and when their specialist skills are required. The unit is not limited to a uniformed role but is able to respond in a manner appropriate to the circumstances of a particular operation.

Entry Clearance Applications

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the current delay in inquiries being made into entry clearance applications being referred to the United Kingdom for further inquiry; what proposals he has to increase staff who are undertaking such inquiries; and what proposals he has to expedite inquiry reports being submitted to overseas post.

Mr. Renton: The time taken to make inquiries into entry clearance applications referred by overseas posts to the Home Office depends on the individual nature of the case, in particular whether an interview is needed. Entry clearance inquiries are an integral part of the work of the immigration department and are taken into account in determining staffing levels. Further, the recent immigration rules changes were designed to reduce the burden of routine work and thus to release resources to enable staff to deal more speedily with the other aspects of their work, including entry clearance referrals.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many entry clearance applications have been referred to him for inquiries to be made in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; how many such refusals have been made in 1988 to the latest available date; how many immigration officers are involved full-time with such inquiry work; what is the minimum and maximum delay in arranging interviews currently; and what is the current minimum and maximum time taken between a case being referred to his Department and reports being received by the appropriate overseas post.

Mr. Renton: The information is not available in the form requested. The available information is as follows:

Entry clearance applications referred to immigration service headquarters for inquiries to be made through local immigration offices:

Year	Number
1983	2,336
1984	2,351
1985	2,258
1986	2,109
1987	2,084
[1]1988	1,169

[1] 1 January to 13 May.

These inquiries represent only part of the duties of immigration officers at the ports involved and no officers are currently employed full-time on entry clearance interviews.

Arrangements for interviews are made immediately on receipt of the file at most ports although the maximum time at others before these arrangements can be made is up to a month.

Immigration

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many immigrants have been admitted for settlement in the 10 years 1978 to 1987; what is his best estimate of the number likely to be admitted over the years 1988 to 1997; what estimate has been made of the cost to public funds of providing housing, school and hospital places to meet this influx; and what budgetary provision has been made to meet it.

Mr. Renton: The numbers persons subject to immigration control who were accepted for settlement in the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years is as follows:

	Number
1978	72,330
1979	69,670
1980	69,750
1981	59,060
1982	53,870
1983	53,460
1984	50,950
1985	55,360
1986	46,820
1987	45,980

There is no estimate made of the numbers of likely to be granted settlement in the next 10 years or of the costs or contributions to public funds which might result from this component of the total likely change in the population of the United Kingdom over that period.

Plans for the provision of housing, school and hospital places take into account overall changes in population, including estimates of net migration. These are the subject of projections produced by the Government Actuary's Department (national figures) and by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys with the Department of the Environment (for local authorities).

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of producing the Home Office research unit's study of neighbourhood watch schemes by Professor Rosenbaum published on 16 May.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 23 May 1988]: Professor Rosenbaum contributed a chapter to a book entitled "Communities and Crime Reduction." This followed his contribution at an open conference in 1986 on crime prevention. This book was produced by the Home Office research and planning unit and published by HMSO on 16 May. A copy has been placed in the Library. He was not paid a fee and the cost to the Home Office was nil.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Durham County Council

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from Durham county council and other interested parties about its inability to meet its obligations through Government spending restrictions.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received representations from the Durham local education authority about the level of its education prescribed expenditure allocations for 1987-88 and 1988-89. The criteria used for determining those allocations are designed to ensure that all LEAs receive fair and equitable treatment and that none should find itself unable to fulfil its statutory obligations.

Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities (Veterinary Colleges)

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report the names and status of those University Grants Committee members who visited the veterinary colleges of Glasgow and Edinburgh universities during the week beginning 16 May.

Mr. Jackson: In its review of veterinary education, the UGC is being advised by a committee of six experts chaired by Sir Ralph Riley, DSc, FRS, former secretary and deputy chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council. Only Professor T. A. Douglas, PhD, MRCVS (department of veterinary clinical biochemistry, Glasgow university) is also a member of the UGC. Because of a clash of interests, Professor Douglas did not visit the Glasgow veterinary college. Otherwise, all members of the review group visited both establishments.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what sums in total his Department has allocated for spending on capital, current and other costs of city technology colleges for the current financial year and for 1989-90, 1990-91 and 1991-92.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Overall planned expenditure on the city technology colleges programme is £19 million for the current financial year, £33 million for 1989-90 and £34 million for 1990-91. Future plans will be the subject of review during the year since 1991-92 falls outside the current public expenditure planning period. It is not possible at this stage to provide a breakdown showing capital and recurrent costs separately as this depends on a number of factors including the nature and condition of premises acquired, and the speed at which sponsors' plans are implemented.

Teachers (Qualifications)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any proposals to amend the arrangements for granting qualified teacher status in England and Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: After consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales I am today issuing a consultation document proposing new arrangements for granting qualified teacher status in England and Wales.

I propose to simplify the arrangements governing the employment in England and Wales of teachers from other parts of the United Kingdom and from overseas and to introduce clearer and better arrangements for the entry to teaching of persons with relevant experience and other qualifications who have not completed courses of pre-service training.

My objectives are to:

- enhance quality by requiring that—except in closely prescribed cases—all those entering teaching by other than the normal initial training route should have demonstrated the necessary knowledge, personal qualities and teaching ability in the classroom before being granted qualified teacher status;
- ensure that the arrangements for granting qualified teacher status are better able to serve the needs of employers;
- reduce significantly the administrative complexity of the present arrangements.

With certain limited exceptions, primarily for teachers from other parts of the United Kingdom or other parts of the education service, I therefore propose that all entrants to teaching by other than the standard training route should have to have satisfactorily completed a period of service as a licensed teacher and any associated training required by the employer before being eligible for qualified teacher status.

To secure that appropriate statutory authority exists for the new arrangements as these may be implemented in the light of the process of consultation, the Government will table appropriate amendments to the Education Reform Bill now being considered in another place.

I am also proposing to revoke the regulations providing for a statutory system of probation for teachers. The present system has proved cumbersome and ineffective. It should be the responsibility of the employer to provide support for the beginning teacher, to monitor his performance and, if necessary, to decide that that performance is unsatisfactory.

Full details of my proposals are set out in the consultation document: copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses and in the Vote and Printed Paper Offices. I shall invite replies to the consultation document by mid-October.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Overseas Takeover Bids

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make it his policy to ensure that there is full reciprocity in connection with bids for British companies from companies located overseas which protect themselves by devices such as the weighting of voting rights in order to enable minority shareholders to retain control; if he will investigate the wide variety of such obstacles permitted in the state of Delaware in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: It is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading to consider all aspects of a proposed merger when preparing his advice to the Secretary of State on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission under the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973. With regard to inward investment, one consideration that may be relevant in some cases is the extent to which United Kingdom companies have reciprocal freedom to acquire companies based in the home country of the prospective acquirer.

I am aware of Delaware state takeover law.

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consideration he has given to the economic and social implications of business decisions affecting the future of British companies, their shareholders and employees, being transferred to centres offshore and outside the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: As stated in the DTI Blue Paper on mergers policy, issued March 1988, the Government's general attitude towards inward investment is to welcome it, whether it be by acquisition or by direct inward investment.

Nevertheless, there are instances in which foreign ownership of the United Kingdom company may raise particular concerns, and in such cases the power to make a reference if the proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission is available. Each case is considered individually on its merits in accordance with the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

The main consideration in deciding whether to make a reference to the MMC is the effect on competition but other relevant aspects of a case are also taken into account, including wider public interest issues.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what, for each year since 1975, was the percentage fluctuation in the foreign trade of Belgium, Denmark, France, Holland, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, West Germany and Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the following table:

Trading Standards Officers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has on the present number of trading standards officers in England and Wales on 30 April and for the same period in 1987 and 1986.

Mr. Butcher: The information is not available for 1988 or in the form requested for the previous years. However, the following table provides figures for the years ending 31 March 1986 and 1987.

Number of qualified trading standards officers in post with local weights and measures authorities

	Year ending 31 March
	1986	1987
England	1,277	1,196·6
Wales	95	97
Total England and Wales	1,372	1,293·6

Notes:
1. The figures have been collated from the annual returns of local weights and measures authorities.
2. Provisional figures have been entered for the small number of local weights and measures authorities for whom information is not available.

Pirate Radio (Birmingham)

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he intends to take to deal with the increase in pirate radio broadcasting in Birmingham.

Mr. Butcher: During 1987, my Department's radio investigation service (RIS) carried out 19 raids on three unlicensed stations in Birmingham. So far this year, the RIS has raided four Birmingham stations eight times, and interviewed eight people for possible prosecution under the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949. The RIS will continue to act to remove unlicensed transmitters causing interference to authorised radio services, and we shall be seeking to strengthen the terms of the law concerning the unlicensed use of radio as soon as possible.

Biwater Project

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many British officials (a) testified to and (b) submitted written evidence to the Awoniyi commission of inquiry into the Biwater project.

Mr. Alan Clark: No British officials testified to the Awoniyi commission of inquiry. Her Majesty's Government submitted written responses to questions put to it by the commission.

Radio Britannia

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action his Department is taking to stop the illegal broadcasting by Radio Britannia in south London.

Mr. Butcher: A recently established unlicensed broadcaster calling itself Radio Britannia on a frequency of 95·3 MHz was raided by radio investigation service officers on 18 May. One person was interviewed for possible prosecution under the Wireless Telegraphy Act, and the station's equipment was seized.

Anglo-Soviet Trade

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give the figures for trade between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union for each year between 1975 and 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

United Kingdom Trade with the Soviet Union 1975-1987

Value in £ millions

	Imports	Exports
1975	235·8	211·4
1976	460·1	241·5

Turkish Yarn (Imports)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which companies have made representations to him about trading difficulties caused by Turkish yarns imports in the last two years.

Mr. Alan Clark: The following United Kingdom producer companies have made representations to the Department about problems resulting from the import of Turkish acrylic hosiery yarn:

Benson, Turner Ltd.
Courtaulds plc (on behalf of Courtaulds Spinning)
Listers & Co. plc.
Mossley Wool Combing & Spinning Co. Ltd.
Thomas Burnley and Sons Ltd.

In addition, representations have been made on behalf of this sector by the British Textile Confederation and the Confederation of British Wool Textiles.

Representations have also been made by hon. Members on behalf of United Kingdom producers and of United Kingdom users writing in their support.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action he is taking and what representations he is making to reduce the volume of Turkish yarn imports into the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Following the renewal, from 1 January 1988, of the informal voluntary restraint arrangement between the European Community and Turkish textile export associations which covers cotton yarn and acrylic hand knitting yarn and was extended to cover acrylic hosiery yarn for the first time, the Department is monitoring the situation closely. In fact the volume of acrylic yarn imports from Turkey has fallen off sharply in the first three months of 1988, compared with the same period last year. The Department's unfair trade unit is assisting the United Kingdom industry in preparing an anti-dumping complaint on Turkish acrylic hosiery yarn.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received from Courtaulds Spinning about the effect of Turkish textile imports on production at the factory at Broad lane, Bramley, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department has received a number of representations from representatives of Courtaulds plc, on behalf of Courtaulds Spinning, about the effect of imports of Turkish acrylic hosiery yarn on their business over the past year. Most recently Courtaulds provided detailed information on 4 May concerning the impact of these imports on its activities at Bramley, and at Worksop, in support of an anti-dumping complaint being prepared by the industry.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations listed by date and reference, he has received from Courtaulds plc about the impact of Turkish textile imports in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department has received a number of representations from Courtaulds plc about the impact of Turkish textile imports over the last 12 months. These have either been made direct to the Department or as part of representations made by the sector as a whole. It is not possible to list them in the form requested.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Butcher [holding answer 23 May 1988]: Members of staff of the Department of Trade and Industry are not permitted in their private capacity to hold directorships (other than in small, private, "family-type" companies); or to engage in consultancy work which has a connection with official duties or is on behalf of a firm or concern which is in a contractual or other special relationship with the Department. Currently no member of staff has permission to hold a directorship or act as consultant in a private capacity. Permission is granted only if the directorship or consultancy does not require attendance during office hours; would not impair the officer's usefulness as a civil servant; and does not conflict with the interests of the Department. If permission is granted no restriction as to remuneration is attached.

As part of the Department's policy of encouraging and maintaining close links with industry and commerce, seven members of staff have been appointed in their official capacity as directors of public liability companies on a part-time basis. No central record is kept of consultancies undertaken by members of staff as part of official duties. Officials are not separately remunerated for directorships or consultancies, but expenses incurred on the business of the private organisations may be reimbursed.

ENVIRONMENT

Sewage Sludge

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has plans to apply restrictions on the applications of sewage sludges with high nitrogen and phosphorus content to arable land; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: No. The Department and the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service have already published advice to water authorities and farmers respectively about the disposal of sewage sludge to land.

Barter Deals

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the qualifications and criteria by which barter deals between local authorities and the private sector will be judged to be bona fide transactions.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend announced on 25 April, at columns 103-104, the criteria against which he would consider applications for additional capital allocations for schemes affected by the measures he announced on 9 March. Guidance on how to apply for such allocations will be issued to local authorities shortly.

Property Services Agency

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which office buildings, whether leasehold or freehold, in central London within the Property Services Agency control in both the civil and military estates are going to be surplus to requirements in the next four years; and what is their floor area.

Mr. Chope: It is the aim of the Property Services Agency to dispose of accommodation, whether freehold or leasehold, when it becomes surplus to Government requirements. A number of leases in central London are due to terminate during the next four years and the landlords may wish to recover possession of the buildings for refurbishment or redevelopment. The PSA will take the opportunities as and when they may arise to rationalise its holdings with the aim of minimising overall costs of accommodation to the Exchequer. Negotiations with landlords are always conducted on a commercial and therefore confidential basis. The future of office buildings in central London on the military estate is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Council House Sales

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the reason for the delay in the acknowledgement by Southwark LBC of the right-to-buy application of Mrs. E. Stevens of 138A Coplestor Road, Peckham SE15.

Mrs. Roe: According to Southwark council, shortage of staff and high volume of work. The application was accepted on 19 May.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total rate support grant paid to local authorities in (a) the south-east region, (b) Greater London, (c) outer London and (d) inner London, in total, in each year from 1979-80 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Chope: The information is as follows:

Rate support grant

	South east region £ million	Greater London £ million	Outer London[1] £ million	Inner London[2] £ million
1979-80	2,473	1,285	772	513

[3] London boroughs' grant entitlements changed in 1986-87, following the abolition of the GLC.
Notes:
Rate support grant comprises needs, resources and domestic elements in 1979-80 and 1980-81 and block grant, domestic rate relief grant in the following years.
The figures given are the latest available grant entitlements. These are final for the years 1979-80 to 1984-85 inclusive.

Ealing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the housing investment programme allocations, and what was the total spending power out of capital receipts of the London borough of Ealing in each of the last five years and for the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe: HIP allocations (in £ million) have been made as follows:

	£ million
1983-84	16·283
1984-85	15·140
1985-86	12·553
1986-87	11·812
1987-88	10·653
1988-89	[1]10·864

[1] Initial allocation only.

The total spending power out of capital receipts, from figures supplied by Ealing council, was £13·8 million for 1985-86 and £18·2 million for 1986-87. Information for other years is not available.

Local Government Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will reconsider reducing the age of entry into the local government superannuation scheme from 18 to 16 years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will abolish the 12-month waiting period for manual workers to enter the local government superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No. The rules which debar admission to the scheme to employees under the age of 18 and to manual workers during their first year of service were made many years ago with the agreement of the local government employers and the unions. There is nothing in the recent social security legislation which requires an occupational pension scheme to admit classes of employees who have previously been excluded.

Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates have been made of workers nearing the end of their service who have opted out of the local government superannuation scheme and, because of the diminished advantage of a personal pension, joined the state earnings-related pension scheme; and how this will affect the Government's plan to reduce the cost of the state earnings-related pension scheme.

Mr. Chope: The regulations under which employees may elect to leave the local government scheme only came into force on 6 April, and it is too early to estimate the numbers and ages of those who will take advantage of the new provisions.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his reply to the letter he has received from the Ramblers Association dated 13 May on the subject of planning precedents and opencast mining.

Mr. Trippier: An official reply was sent to the Ramblers' Association on 19 May: publication is a matter for the association. I have no objection to its doing so.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to issue a consultation document on local government finance with reference to the use of capital receipts.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend hopes shortly to put forward proposals for a new legislative framework for all aspects of local authority capital expenditure and finance.

"News on Sunday"

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he plans to take against those local authorities which invested pension funds in News on Sunday; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on 3 December 1987 at column 642.

Palace of Westminster (Toilets)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the last two occasions when the wall tiles in the ladies' toilets of the Committee Room Corridor were fully cleaned; when the floor was cleaned; and if he will give the same information for each of the ladies' toilets in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The wall tiles and floors were cleaned in accordance with the terms of the contract today and yesterday.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Disarmament (Verification)

97. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any information on progress being made on verification procedures in the INF and START talks.

Mr. Mellor: Mr. Shultz and Mr. Shevardnadze announced that they had resolved the outstanding United States-Soviet problems on the INF treaty verification procedures in Geneva on 11-12 May. They also reviewed the progress made in the START negotiations which of course include detailed verification provisions.

Maori Warrior's Head (Sale)

Mr. Robert Hicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the New Zealand Government, the National Maori Council, Survival International, and any other organisations or individuals about the proposed sale of a Maori warrior's head at a London auction house on Friday 20 May; what response he has made and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have received representations from Survival International and the Maori Council of New Zealand. These are being studied in the light of the litigation at present under way.

Hong Kong

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when and how he intends to make representations to the Government of China in relation to the Basic Law of Hong Kong.

Mr. Mellor: The drafting of the Basic Law is the responsibility of the Chinese Government. However, as my right hon. and learned Friend stated in Parliament on 20 January, we will wish to satisfy ourselves that the Basic Law accurately reflects the provisions of the joint declaration. The draft Basic Law has already featured in a number of our exchanges with the Chinese authorities. If there are points which we consider are inconsistent with the joint declaration, we will make our views known to the Chinese authorities clearly and firmly.

Japanese Wartime Signals

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of the release of Japanese diplomatic intercepts to the national archives in the United States of America and the availability of the same material in Japan, he will authorise the transfer to the Public Records Office of the 1,800 decrypts of signals sent by the wartime Japanese naval attaché in Berlin presently retained by his Department.

Mr. Mellor: No.

St. John's Church, Maseru

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make representations to the Government of Lesotho stressing the historical importance and significance of St. John's church, Maseru, and the war memorial which it contains; and if he will seek assurances that the church will not be demolished;

(2) if he will seek clarification from the High Commissioner in Lesotho about reported proposals that the historic British church of St. John, Maseru, and the war memorial which it contains, are to be demolished; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: This is a matter for the Anglican Church in Lesotho. I understand that the diocesan and church councillors are considering ways of developing the site, but that they are concerned to preserve the church and its war memorial.

Entry Clearance Applications

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning delays in decisions being taken on entry clearance applications made on the Indian sub-continent because of the need for inquiries to be made in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We receive a number of representations from hon. and right hon. Members concerning individual cases. Specific statistics about such letters are not kept separately.

Gibraltar (Shootings)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Gibraltar coroner about the postponement of the inquest into the deaths of three IRA personnel from June until August.

Mr. Mellor: The date of the inquest is a matter for the coroner. He announced in Gibraltar on 23 May that the inquest would not now be held in June, and a further statement giving the new date would be made as soon as possible.

Cash Limits

Sir Peter Blaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he proposes to make any changes to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office cash limits.

Mr. Eggar: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised and Supplementary Estimates, the cash limit for Class II Vote 1 (overseas representation) will be reduced by £2,861,000 from £434,883,000 to £432,022,000 and the cash limit for Vote 3 (BBC external broadcasting and monitoring) will be increased by the corresponding amount of £2,861,000 from £114,621,000 to £117,482,000. This reflects the rationalisation of the operation of the three FCO broadcast relay stations at Orfordness, Masirah and Cyprus whereby the BBC external services will take over financial responsibility from the FCO for certain United Kingdom-based BBC support staff, technical maintenance and utilities costs. The transfer does not represent increased funding for additional broadcasting activity; nor does it add to the planning total of public expenditure.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Belfast Urban Area Plan Inquiry

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) by what authority permission was granted to representatives of Sinn Fein to make representations in Irish before the public inquiry into the Belfast urban area plan;

(2) what was the cost of providing a translator when representatives of Sinn Fein made representations in Irish before the public inquiry into the Belfast urban area plan on 5 May.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 19 May 1988]: All arrangements for the public inquiry are the responsibility of the independent Planning Appeals Commission. I understand, however, that the cost of providing a translator was in the region of £25.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Staff

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of staff employed in the private offices of his Parliamentary Under-Secretaries in July 1987 and April 1988.

Mr. Rifkind: There were 2·25 whole-time equivalent staff in each of the private offices of the two Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State on 1 July 1987 and 1 April 1988.

Nurses

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average increase in weekly pay for nurses in Scotland following the increase approved in April.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government's acceptance of the recommendations made by the Nurses' Pay Review Body this year will result in a wide range of pay increases from 4·2 per cent. to 33·6 per cent. with the largest percentage increases going to staff covered by the new clinical grading structure. For individuals with posts in the new clinical grading structure the outcome will be dependent on their placing within it but the total cost of this year's award has been estimated as 14·5 per cent. excluding the cost of London supplements. Examples of annual salaries for nursing staff in direct patient care areas from 1 April 1988 are shown in the table in terms of scale minima and maxima. The salaries payable from 1 April 1987 are shown for comparison, as are the equivalent gross increases in weekly pay.

Grade	1987 £ year	1988 £ year	Approximate gross increase £/week
Student Nurse
Minimum	4,540	4,825	5·48

News Releases

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in full, the names of all organisations and individuals who are on the Scottish Information Office's distribution list for news releases.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall arrange for a list to be placed in the House of Commons Library as soon as possible.

Cairngorms

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to alter the national planning guidelines on skiing to allow a road to be built into the northern corries area of the Cairngorms.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to do so.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department treats the Cairngorms as qualifying for designation under the World Heritage convention; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has received a recommendation from the Nature Conservancy Council, supported by the Countryside Commission for Scotland, that the Cairngorms should be inscribed on the World Heritage list. The recommendation is being considered in the light of the criteria for natural sites set by the World Heritage convention. My right hon. and learned Friend will announce his decision in due course. The status of the Cairngorms as a national scenic area, and of large parts of it as national nature reserve or as sites of special scientific interest, already provide protection for the special qualities of the area.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Cairngorms will be notified as a special protection area under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds (EC 79/409); and whether the area notified will include the northern corries site of special scientific interest.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand that it is the Nature Conservancy Council's intention to put forward detailed advice to the Secretary of State later this year on the classification of the Cairngorms as a special protection area under EC directive 79/409, and that the council may recommend inclusion of the northern corries site of special scientific interest within the area to be classified. I cannot say when the Secretary of State will thereafter reach a decision.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to the number of days that the main Cairngorm chairlift was operating each month during the period April to October, inclusive, for each of the past five years; and if he will list the number of chairlift tickets sold in each month during the last five years.

Mr. Lang: These are operational and commercial matters concerning the Cairngorm Chairlift Company which is a private enterprise.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to what guidance is given to visitors using the Cairngorm chairlifts in order to reduce damage inflicted upon sensitive plants and wild animals in the Cairngorms.

Mr. Lang: The chairlifts are operated by the Cairngorm Chairlift company which is a private enterprise. The hon. Member may wish to note, however, that the Highlands and Islands Development Board as owner of the Cairngorm Estate has recently published a management plan, which sets out its policies for managing the estate. A copy has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of what steps have been taken, or are planned, by the chairlift operators as landowners of the Cairngorm skiing grounds to reduce damage by visitors to sensitive plants and wild animals found on the Cairngorm plateau; and if he will specify how much has been spent in these matters in each of the past five years.

Mr. Lang: The skiing area is leased to the Cairngorm Chairlift Co. Ltd. by the Highlands and Islands Development Board. The board and the company have no direct responsibility for conservation of the Cairngorm plateau. This is owned privately and, as a national nature reserve, is the subject of a management agreement with the Nature Conservancy Council.

East Kilbride (Housing)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations have taken place between officials of the East Kilbride development corporation and the private sector on the sale of all or any part of the public sector housing stock under the management of the development corporation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: No such consultations have taken place.

Rating Reform

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on the application of the poll tax to monastic communities.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has given careful consideration to the position of members of religious orders under the community charge system and has decided that there should be an exemption from the personal community charge for members of religious communities the principal occupation of which is prayer, contemplation, the relief of suffering, education or such other activities as may be prescribed. The exemption will be limited to monks and nuns who are dependent on the community for their material needs and who have no income or capital of their own. Income from a pension in respect of a former employment will however be disregarded. Appropriate amendments to the Local Government Finance Bill will be brought forward in due course.

Quality Street Housing Association

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the discussions taking place between officials of Glenrothes development corporation and Quality Street housing association.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish new town development corporations regularly meet representatives of private sector companies to discuss proposals for the further development of the towns. The present discussions between Quality Street and Glenrothes development corporation represent but one example of that continuing dialogue. The present discussions are at a very preliminary stage. Should definite proposals be agreed between the parties it will then be a matter for the development corporation to approach my Department in the usual manner to seek the Secretary of State's consent. Meantime, I welcome the prospective participation of Quality Street in Glenrothes and hope that satisfactory proposals can be developed which will add to the housing options available to residents in the town.

New Town Development Corporations

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the regulations or advice given to new town development corporations on the timing and disclosure of information to board members or meetings of development corporations or sub-committee.

Mr. Lang: These matters are determined by the boards of the development corporations on the advice of the appropriate chief executive—managing director.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of regulations or advice given to new town development corporations on the disclosure of information to press and public.

Mr. Lang: It is for each development corporation to determine whether or not to open board meetings to the press and public. Glenrothes development corporation held its first open board meeting in November 1986, and Livingston development corporation in summer 1987.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the regulations or advice given to new town development corporations on the disclosure of information to his Department.

Mr. Lang: New town development corporations disclose information to my Department on request.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the present members of new town development corporation boards, the nominating organisation and the date of appointment and the date of termination of appointment of each member.

Mr. Lang: This information is available in the annual report of each of the Scottish new town development corporations, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the official guidance available to new town development corporations involved in disposing of public sector housing or development land.

Mr. Lang: The terms on which new town development corporations may dispose of land are detailed in section 18(5) of the New Towns (Scotland) Act 1968. That section provides that, except with the consent of the Secretary of State, development corporations shall not dispose of land otherwise than on the best terms that can reasonably be obtained. The same statutory prescription of the terms governing disposal also applies to public sector housing, since "land" in Scots law includes buildings situated upon that land.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total amount of housing land available and owned by development corporations in each of Scotland's new towns.

Mr. Lang: As part of the review announced by the Secretary of State for Scotland on 13 May 1988, Official Report, column 280, an exercise is presently under way to establish precisely the information sought. Once that exercise is concluded, I shall write to the hon. Member with the information he requests.

Ro-Ro Ferries

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make financial provisions to assist the operators of roll-on/roll-off ferries which serve the Scottish islands to either replace or adapt those vessels which do not comply with new IMO stability standards.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: International Maritime Organisation stability standards for new vessels will not be considered for adoption until later this year. Until that time it will not be possible to assess the implications for ferry operators.

New Towns (Housing)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if any discussions have taken place between Ministers or officials and representatives of Glenrothes development corporation on the sale of housing assets in the new town.

Mr. Lang: Discussions have taken place on this subject on a number of occasions in recent years between my officials and officers of Glenrothes development corporation. The developments at Alexander road, Huntly drive and Durris drive arise directly from those discussions. Furthermore, Glenrothes development corporation's sales of housing to sitting tenants have proved very successful and the 5,000th such sale is expected to take place in the very near future.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met with Scottish local authorities with new towns to discuss the future of public sector housing in Scotland's five new towns.

Mr. Lang: The last such meeting took place on 3 October 1986. I am due to meet SLANT (Scottish Local Authorities with New Towns) in London in early June.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he or any of his officials have met Kirkcaldy district council in its current year to discuss the future of the public sector housing stock in Glenrothes new town.

Mr. Lang: No.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if any discussions have taken place between Ministers or officials and representatives of Quality Street housing association on the sale of housing assets in Glenrothes new town.

Mr. Lang: No.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if any discussions have taken place between either Ministers or officials of the Scottish Office and Quality Street housing association on the sale of new town housing assets in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: No.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to ensure that Scottish new towns do not enter into agreements to sell public housing assets to organisations other than individual tenants in advance of the coming into force of the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

Mr. Lang: No. Scottish new town development corporations have over the last three years successfully concluded agreements whereby 608 houses have been sold to the private sector for refurbishment and subsequent sale to new town residents. Of these, 99 houses were in Glenrothes in the Alexander road, Huntly drive and Durris drive areas. The Government's proposals in clause 67 of the Housing (Scotland) Bill are designed to remove the limitations in section 18 of the New Towns (Scotland) Act 1968, whereby disposals by a development corporation may be solely for the laying out or development of the new town. Given the maturity of the Scottish new towns, the Government concluded that this constraint was both dated and unnecessary.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of public sector houses and flats in each of Scotland's new towns.

Mr. Lang: The information is available at page 36 of the "Scottish Housing Statistics 1986", published in 1987, copies of which are available in the Library, although separate information on houses and flats is not available centrally.

House Sales

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of district council or new town corporation sales of public sector housing in stock approved by him in each year from 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Lang: The information is contained in SDD statistical bulletin, HSIU No. 34—Q4(87), table 5, a copy of which was sent to all Scottish Members in April 1988.

Local Authorities (Compensation)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements he makes to compensate local authorities for the costs of reinstatement grants or repurchasing of houses under part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under section 296 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, the Secretary of State may contribute to local authorities' expenditure in giving assistance under the Act as follows:

Reinstatement: 90 per cent. of the annual loan charges on the amount of the grant.

Repurchase: 75 per cent. of the loan charges on the relevant amount where the dwelling was originally sold by the authority or a predecessor; or 100 per cent. where it was sold by another public sector body.

(The relevant amount is the price paid by the authority plus the seller's reasonable legal and other expenses, less the defective value of the house).

Defective Housing

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate how many houses categorised as defective under part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 remain in the ownership of (a) each local housing authority, (b) each new town development corporation or (c) the Scottish Special Housing Association.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested, based on returns by the bodies concerned to the Scottish Development Department, is set out in the table. No houses of the type described are owned by any of the new town development corporations or by those local authorities not entered in the table.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many houses which are categorised as defective under part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 have been purchased by sitting tenants since the passage of the Housing (Scotland) Act; and how many have subsequently been (a) repurchased by the land authority or (b) reinstated with grant aid.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Assistance under the Housing Defects Act 1984, now consolidated as part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, is generally available only to those persons who bought their houses before the designated cut-off date of 26 April 1984. No information is therefore held centrally on defective houses purchased by sitting tenants after that date or of any subsequent resale to the authority.

Council House Sales

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the typical cost to a local housing authority of (a) the discount on the sale of a house to a tenant who qualifies for the maximum discount, (b) the cost of repurchasing the house at 95 per cent. defect-free value under part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 and (c) reinstating the house to the required structural standard.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The discount element of a sale under the right to buy legislation does not involve a housing authority in any cost, whilst the sale generates receipts which would not otherwise be realised.

The average cost of repurchasing a house designated as defective under the provisions of part XIV of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987, at 95 per cent. of the defect-free value, is £21,000. During the course of each financial year, housing authorities are issued with special supplementary capital allocations to cover such liabilities.

In Scotland, no reinstatements have yet been completed, so typical costs for this work cannot be determined.

Fife Health Board

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the decision of Fife health board to appoint Colonel Francis Gibb to the position of general manager of Fife health board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. The appointment of a general manager is a matter for Fife health board.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he or his officials have met the chairman of Fife health board to discuss the appointment of Colonel Francis Gibb to the post of general manager.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. In the usual way the short list of candidates for the post was cleared in advance with my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the costs incurred by Fife health board in appointing a firm of consultants to find suitable applicants for the post of general manager.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No. The costs incurred by Fife health board are a matter for the board.

Health Boards (Managers)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the names, together with details of previous occupations, of all health board general managers in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:—

Health Board	General Manager	Previous Occupation
Argyll and Clyde	Mr. I. C. Smith	Health Service Treasurer
Ayrshire and Arran	Mr. J. M. Eckford	Health Service Secretary
Borders	Mr. D. A. Peters	Health Service Secretary
Dumfries and Galloway	Mr. M. D. Cook	Health Service Treasurer
Forth Valley	Mr. A. R. Robertson	Health Service Secretary
Grampian	Mr. H. Fullerton	Director, Wiggins Teape
Greater Glasgow	Mr. L. Peterken	Controller of Operational Services, Greater London Council
Highland	Mr. R. R. W. Stewart	Health Service Secretary
Lanarkshire	Mr. F. Clark	Health Service Secretary
Lothian	Mr. W. J. Tayler	Health Service Administrator
Tayside	Dr. R. C. Graham	Chief Administrative Medical Officer
Orkney	Dr. J. Cromarty	Chief Administrative Medical Officer
Shetland	Mr. D. C. March	Health Service Secretary
Western Isles	Mr. J. Glover	Health Service Secretary

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice is given to health boards on the appointment of general managers; and what regulations apply to such appointments.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Advice to health boards on the appointments of general managers is contained in NHS circular 1985 (GEN)4 issued on 8 March 1985. A copy of the circular is in the Library of the House. This advice was issued for the initial appointments and central advertising is not undertaken for subsequent appointments. There are no statutory regulations applying to these appointments.

Drug Tariff

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to add to the drug tariff in Scotland any health care products that are currently available only through the hospital or community health services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the White Paper "Promoting Better Health" published on 25 November 1987, the Government announced that as soon as the necessary arrangements could be made they would make both blood glucose testing strips for diabetics and a new range of wound care products available on prescription. I am pleased to be able to announce that from 1 June 1988 that blood glucose testing strips together with single use lancets will be available on prescription in Scotland; and that from 1 July 1988 general practitioners in Scotland will be able to prescribe two of the new wound care products, namely Granuflex and Sorbsan dressings.

Both the diabetic test equipment and the new types of wound care products are currently available through the hospital and community health services. But by making them available through family doctor prescription, a better and more convenient service to patients will be provided. In the case of diabetic testing materials, the wider availability will make a valuable contribution to enabling diabetics to treat and monitor their condition independently in their own homes. The new wound care products are more comfortable for patients than traditional dressings and make for quicker healing.

Tayside Region (Assistance)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the level of (a) regional selective assistance (b) regional development grant, (c) European Community loans paid through the European Investment Bank, (d) national selective assistance and (e) the Government's loan guarantee scheme which is paid to the Tayside region; and what proportion this represents of the respective totals for (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 April 1988]: Comprehensive information in the precise form requested is not available. Available information for 1986-87 and 1987-88 is set out in the table:

	Tayside payments		Tayside as percentage of Scottish total		Tayside as percentage of Great Britain total
	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million	1986-87 Per cent.	1987-88 Per cent.	1986-87 Per cent.	1987-88 Per cent.
Regional selective assistance	2·9	2·0	8·3	5·3	2·3	1·4
Regional development grant I[1]	5·1	0·6	4·6	1·8	1·6	0·6
Regional development grant II	3·1	3·8	8·2	8·7	2·6	2·6

	Tayside loans disbursed		Tayside as percentage of Scottish total		Tayside as percentage of United Kingdom total
	1986-87 £ million	1987-88 £ million	1986-87 Per cent.	1987-88 Per cent.	1986-87 Per cent.	1987-88 Per cent.
European investment bank loans[2]	2·2	—	16·0	—	3·3	—
Loan guarantee scheme	0·1	0·4	3·4	11·4	0·3	0·8

[1] Changes to the Regional development grant scheme were introduced in 1984. For the earlier scheme RDG I, data refers to payments over £25,000 as comprehensive figures are not available on a local basis.

[2] Information is available only for loans for which cover was provided under the exchange risk guarantee scheme. The scheme has not applied to European Investment Bank loans since 18 July 1985 and figures for 1986-87 relate to offers made before that date.

Chernobyl (Compensation)

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications have been received for a review of their case from farmers in Scotland claiming to have suffered losses as a result of the Chernobyl disaster but who had not been compensated under the Government's scheme; if he will give the dates between which they were made; if each such application was considered individually; on what date a decision was taken on them; how many of them he has rejected; and if he will make a statement on the general pattern of the defects in the applications which led to their rejection.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 19 May 1988]: A total of some £1·5 million has been paid to sheep farmers in Scotland since 1986 to compensate them from the effects of the Chernobyl disaster. The compensation arrangements have in general been welcomed by the National Farmers Union of Scotland, who have not found it necessary to submit any cases for review on the lines adopted by their counterparts in England and Wales. No cases are at present under review in Scotland, but two farming businesses have made, and are continuing to make, representations to the effect that they have not been compensated for losses which they claim to have suffered as a result of restrictions imposed in the aftermath of the Chernobyl incident.

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money has been spent by his Department on television advertising in each of the past three years.

Mr. Cope: The total amount of money spent by this Department on television advertising in 1985, 1986 and 1987 was as follows:

Department of Employment

	£ million
1985-86	Nil
1986-87	9·3
1987-88	[1]3·7

[1] Includes Employment Service expenditure.

Benefits

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many women with dependants have been excluded from eligibility for benefit under the new claims experiment.

Mr. Lee: The experiment involved using more senior staff to interview newly unemployed people. Its aim was to see whether it was possible to provide more advice on both benefit procedures and employment opportunities at the initial point of contact with an unemployed person.

The entitlement rules for benefit remained unchanged during the experiment. Information was not collected on the number of women with dependants who were disallowed benefit during the experiment.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the current trends in unemployment in the United Kingdom regions.

Mr. Lee: Unemployment has fallen in all regions of the United Kingdom over the last 12 months. The largest falls in the unemployment rate have been in the west midlands, north-west and the north.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many job vacancies were registered at jobcentres in the city of Durham, at the most recent available date; what this figure represented as a percentage of registered unemployed; and what the comparable percentage is for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The table shows the number of unfilled vacancies at jobcentres and the number of unemployed claimants for the city of Durham and the United Kingdom in April 1988. It is not meaningful to calculate the ratio of unfilled vacancies at jobcentres to unemployed claimants, since only about a third of all vacancies in the economy are notified to jobcentres.

	Unadjusted
	Unfilled vacancies	Unemployed claimants
City of Durham	447	3,839
United Kingdom	251,300	2,535,989

Tourism

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many overseas visitors visited regions other than London during the last period for which full figures are available.

Mr. Lee: It is estimated that, in 1986, overseas residents made approximately 7·9 million visits to the United Kingdom that included at least one night spent in a region outside London, which represents 57 per cent. of the total number of visits made that year. An equivalent estimate for 1987 will be available later this year.

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of schemes in receipt of funds administered under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969, during the years 1985, 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Lee: Figures are not available in the form requested. The numbers of projects in England to which section 4 assistance was offered were:

	Year	Projects
Projects with assistance totalling £11·5 million	1985-86	542
Projects with assistance totalling £13·9 million	1986-87	630
Projects with assistance totalling £14·8 million	1987-88	609

Economic League

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the implications for industrial relations of the use by employers of the services of the Economic League.

Mr. Nicholls: I have made no such assessment.

Benefit Fraud (Glasgow)

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total cost of the operation which led to the identification of Glasgow taxi drivers who were illegally claiming benefit.

Mr. Lee: The total cost to my Department for the Glasgow taxi drivers exercise was £4,328.

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what means of electronic surveillance was used in Glasgow as part of the operation mounted to detect taxi drivers illegally claiming benefits.

Mr. Lee: Electronic surveillance is not used by my Department.

Mines and Quarries Act 1954

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has consulted British Coal on the replacement of the Mines and Quarries Act 1954; and whether these consultations will be published.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Commission and Executive have consulted British Coal on the renewal of mines and quarries legislation. This forms part of the extensive consultation programme which involves all interested parties within the mining and quarrying industries.

Responses to consultations are not published. The views of all consultees are taken into account both when proposed regulations and codes of practice are drafted and also by the commission when it considers proposals for new legislation.

Cash Limits

Mr. Dickens: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits or running cost limits for 1988-89.

Mr. Fowler: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised and summer Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class VII, vote 1 (employment programmes) will be reduced by £327,452,000 from £1,621,069,000 to £1,293,617,000. The reduction reflects the transfer of provision to class VII, vote 5 (Manpower Services Commission).

The cash limit on class VII, vote 2 (Department of Employment: administration) will be reduced by £702,000 from £263,872,000 to £263,170,000. This is the net effect of the reduction of administrative costs paid to the Manpower Services Commission in respect of the community programme and further adjustment of the provisional split of capital and running costs between the Department of Employment (DE) and the Manpower

Services Commission (MSC) agreed at the time of the 1988-89 main Supply Estimates in respect of certain employment and enterprise functions transferred from MSC to DE on 26 October 1987.

The cash limit for class VII, vote 5 (MSC) will be increased by £281,927,000 from £1,656,251,000 to £1,938,178,000 in order to introduce the employment training programme that I announced on 16 February 1988 at column 825. The increase is the net effect of transfers from class VII, votes 1 and 2, offset by appropriations in aid totalling £46,227,000 from the Industry Department for Scotland (class XVII, vote 4) and the Welsh Office (class XVI, vote 4) towards expenditure on employment training.

The cash limit for class XVI, vote 4 (MSC Scotland) will be increased by £23,719,000 from £186,363,000 to £210,082,000 to meet the proportion of the MSC increases described above which can be specifically identified as applicable to Scotland.

The cash limit for class XVII, vote 4 (MSC Wales) will be increased by £22,508,000 from £120,213,000 to £142,721,000 to meet the proportion of the MSC increases described above which can be specifically identified as applicable to Wales.

Finally, there is a token £1,000 cash limit on the new vote for the sale of professional and executive recruitment (PER), class VII, vote 6.

Consequently the cash limits total for the Department of Employment group as a whole is reduced by £46,226,000 from £3,654,953,000 to £3,608,727,000.

The Department of Employment's running costs limit will be increased by £6,000 from £611,290,000 to £611,296,000. This is the net effect of the transfer back to DE from the MSC of £1,397,000 running costs in respect of the transfer of certain employment and enterprise functions in October 1987 and the reclassification of PER seconded staff salaries out of running costs.

The transfer of running costs to DE has resulted in the MSC's running costs limit being reduced by £1,397,000 from £225,055,000 to £223,658,000.

Consequently the running costs total for the Department of Employment group as a whole is reduced by £1,391,000 from £945,916,000 to £944,525,000.

"Action for Jobs"

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the total expenditure by the Central Office of Information on the Government's "Action for Jobs" programme for each month since its inception to the present day, distinguishing television advertising from other expenditure.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 18 May 1988]: The information requested is not available. Total expenditure by the Central Office of Information on the Government's "Action for Jobs" programme is as follows:

1986-87
Television advertising	9·3
Total expenditure	12
1987-88
Television advertising	2·2
Total expenditure	5

Government Campaigns

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library copies of all leaflets and brochures from the "Action for Jobs" and "Action for Cities" campaigns.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 18 May 1988]: I have arranged for the following leaflets and brochures to be placed in the Library:

— "Action For Jobs" booklet PL843.
— "Action for Jobs" booklet (ethnic language versions) PL782 Hindi, Vietnamese, Urdu, Gujerati, Bengali, Punjabi, Cantonese.
— "Action for Cities" brochure.
— "Action for Cities Guide for Action."

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list, giving the dates of their employment, those advertising firms employed by the Central Office of Information on the "Action for Jobs" and "Action for Cities" campaigns.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 18 May 1988]: Davidson Pearce Ltd. was appointed by the Central Office of Information in April 1986 to the "Action for Jobs" campaign.

The "Action for Cities" campaign does not employ an advertising agency. The "Action for Cities" breakfast presentations are organised by the Commercial Presentations Group, a conference and presentations company which was appointed directly by the Department of Trade and Industry in January 1988.

Turkish Yarn (Imports)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his latest estimate of the total number of workers who have been (a) put on short-time working and (b) declared redundant as a result of Turkish yarn imports; and if he will name the companies involved.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested on short-time working and redundancies is not available from official sources, as there is no reliable way of relating redundancies to imports from a particular country—or indeed to imports in general. The acrylic yarn sector has also been affected by a fall in demand for knitwear.

THE ARTS

Museums, Galleries and Theatres

Mr. Boyes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what plans are currently under consideration for the establishment of new museums, galleries and theatres; and where these will be located.

Mr. Luce: I know that the trustees of the national nuseums and galleries which I sponsor are considering a number of exciting new developments. For example, the Victoria and Albert museum is investigating the possibility of displaying part of its Indian collection at Bradford; the Imperial War museum has plans to establish an American air museum in a new building at Duxford airfield; and the Science museum is looking at a number of possible sites for a new national museum of food and farming. The Tate gallery is about to open the Tate galiery in Liverpool, and the National Portrait gallery is opening a new outstation at Bodelwyddan castle in association with Clwyd county council.

I am aware of some proposals to establish new theatres, such as the plan to set up a theatre in Spitalfields to take productions from the Royal exchange, Manchester; and the moving of the Empire, York, to a new building. The trend for new development in these areas is most encouraging.

Galleries and Museums (Funding)

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is the proportion of public funds (a) given and (b) loaned to galleries and museums in England and Wales during each year since 1983.

Mr. Luce: The expenditure plans of the Office of Arts and Libraries are published every January in the public expenditure White Paper. The principal channels of funding to museums and galleries are:

(i) as grants or grants-in-aid to the national museums and galleries and other directly funded museums in England;

(ii) as grant-in-aid to the Museums and Galleries Commission which then makes grants to the English area museum councils and to non-national museums and galleries throughout the United Kingdom; and

(iii) as rate support grant to English local authorities.

No loans are made from the arts and libraries expenditure programme.

CIVIL SERVICE

Public Bodies

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what percentage of those appointed to national governmental public bodies each year since 1985 are women.

Mr. Luce: Figures are as follows, in each case referring to the percentage of appointments on 1 April that year:

	Per cent.
1985	18
1986	19
1987	19

The figure for 1988 will be published in "Public Bodies" later this year.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Building Societies

Mr. Holland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the share, respectively, of the top three, top six and top 10 United Kingdom building societies as a percentage of total share of deposits and loans of all building societies in 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 23 May 1988]: For 1985 the proportion of total shares, deposits and loans of building societies held by the largest three, largest six and largest 10 societies was 45, 62 and 77 per cent. respectively. For 1986 the figures were 46, 62 and 77 per cent. respectively.

Channel Tunnel (Customs Facilities)

Mr. Adley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress on discussions for on-train customs facilities to be provided for Channel tunnel passengers to London.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 23 May 1988]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on 18 March at column 690.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheepmeat (Testing)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many days elapsed between the taking of sheepmeat samples under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1986 and the results of the tests being available.

Mr. Donald Thompson: There is no standard time between samples being taken and test results being available. Existing arrangements permit most samples to be turned around within 24 hours where this is necessary.

Sewage Sludge

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he intends to take to reduce the contamination of sewage sludge by persistent or toxic substances, which accumulate in living organisms.

Mr. Gummer: The presence of such contaminants in sewage sludge disposed of at sea is permitted in only trace quantities to avoid harm to the marine environment. Extraction of such trace quantities is not practicable. Further reduction in contaminant levels must therefore be achieved by water authorities through their controls on trade discharges to sewers, in the context of Government policy to bring about a substantial reduction in the inputs of dangerous substances to rivers and estuaries by 1995.

Industrial Waste

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he plans to prohibit the dumping of industrial waste into the Irish sea.

Mr. Gummer: There is no dumping at present in the Irish sea of either solid or liquid industrial waste, under the licensing controls of part II of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.

I would examine very rigorously any new application for such dumping.

The Ministry is controlling closely the dumping of sewage sludge and dredged spoil which are also licensed under the Act.

Slimming Products

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what controls there are over foods which claim to be slimming products.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Food Labelling Regulations 1984 set out the conditions that must be met by any food that claims it is an aid to slimming. These include requirements for a nutrition statement on the label and that the food must be capable of contributing to weight control or weight reduction. The requirements also extend to the advertising of such products.

Beef

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what inspections take place of beef landed at United Kingdom ports from the Republic of Ireland for onward shipment to the continent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Animal and public health checks on beef landed at United Kingdom ports from the Republic of Ireland are the same whether the beef is intended for consumption in the United Kingdom or for onward shipment to the continent. Two types of checks are involved: checking of the necessary health certificates against the import documentation is carried out by Customs officers in all cases and physical checking of the meat is carried out on sample consignments by the port health authorities.

Beef entering the United Kingdom for onward shipping to the continent is not eligible for payments of beef variable premium, hence no inspections for this purpose are carried out.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action is taken to ensure that beef landed at United Kingdom ports from the Republic of Ireland for onward shipment to the continent is not subsequently sold in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Goods in transit are subject to control by the country of export. The authorities in that country must be furnished with proof that the goods have reached their intended destination and are not diverted elsewhere. Moreover, beef sent from the Republic of Ireland to the United Kingdom in transit would not benefit from the United Kingdom mca or the beef variable premium. These taken together contribute a significant disincentive to diversion.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the labelling of imported beef which has been produced with the aid of hormones; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: No such representations have been received.

Irradiated Foodstuffs

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and food what recent representations he has received about the case for requiring the labelling of irradiated foodstuffs so as to indicate that they have been irradiated once the ban on irradiation has been lifted; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Many of the people who have written to me about food irradiation express the view that labelling should be required to make it clear when this process has been used. In my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland) on 24 March, at column 207, I made it clear that appropriate labelling provisions are among the controls we are examining.

Contamination

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to complete the revision of his Ministry's contingency plans for dealing with emergency contamination and agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Member on 9 February at column 158.

Cod

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give a table of all cod catch records for all vessels in the Lowestoft fleet for each of the last five years.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 12 May 1988]: Landings of cod by the Lowestoft fleet are not readily available for the previous five-year period, due in part to changes in the fleet over this period and landings by under 40 ft vessels not being individually recorded prior to 1985. Landings of cod into Lowestoft by British vessels for the previous five years together with landings by the Lowestoft fleet during 1987 are however available. These are as follows with figures given in tonnes landed weigh:

Cod landings at Lowestoft by British vessels

	Tonnes landed weight	Value (£ thousands)
1983	3,321	2,093
1984	2,382	1,809
1985	1,638	1,422
1986	1,565	1,540
1987	2,122	2,092

Cod landed by vessels in Lowestoft as at end 1987

Tonnes landed weight	Value (£ thousands)
1973	1,929

Plant Testing and Seed Certification

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the time of his Department's review team which investigated plant variety testing and seed certification systems in the United Kingdom was spent in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, respectively.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 23 May 1988]: Members of the review team made three visits to Scotland, one visit to Wales and one visit to Northern Ireland. In England the team held meetings with various organisations, some of which represented interests for the United Kingdom as a whole. In addition, the team liaised closely with officials in all the Agriculture Departments and with members of the United Kingdom Seeds Executive.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will name the officials of his Department who conducted the review of plant variety testing and seed certification systems in the United Kingdom, giving any relevant information about their qualifications and experience, and making particular reference to any experience connected to Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The names of the four officials who conducted the review are shown in the report on "The Plant Variety Testing and Seed Certification Systems in the United Kingdom." A copy of the report is available in the Library of the House. The team of officials was headed by the controller of plant variety rights for the United Kingdom who is also a member of the United Kingdom Seeds Executive. The team included the chairman of two senior interdepartmental committees with responsibilities for plant variety testing and seed certification matters in the United Kingdom. It is not Government policy to disclose personal details of the qualifications and experience of individual officials.

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 23 May 1988]: As part of a programme for improving awareness of the needs of business, senior officials are from time to time appointed as non-executive directors of commercial companies. At present two officials hold such appointments, for which they receive no remuneration.

Where staff have private business interests of the sort referred to, they are required to seek approval if there is any possibility of conflict with the work of the Department. There are no rules about pay from private business interests.

Sheep Variable Premium

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the sheep variable premium for lowland farmers is likely to be paid.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 23 May 1988]: An announcement on the ewe premium rate on eligible ewes for 1987 was made by the Department on 18 May, following its determination and publication by the European Commission. The final premium will be £6·238 per ewe for lowland producers. LFA producers received an advance of £2·80 per ewe last November and will be paid a balance of £3·438. All payments will be made as soon as possible. Variable premium payments on lambs of certifiable quality have been made throughout the marketing year in the usual way.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dispensing

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what representations he has received from dispensing doctors about the costs of their service compared with the same service provided by dispensing chemists;

(2) whether he will make a statement about the comparative prices per script dispensed by (a) dispensing doctors and (b) dispensing chemists.

Mr. Newton: We have received a few representations from dispensing doctor interests to the effect that dispensing by doctors is less expensive than dispensing by pharmacists. However, it is not possible to make such a comparison because the complex remuneration arrangements for general medical practitioners do not permit the precise separation of dispensing from non-dispensing costs. Thus dispensing fees to dispensing doctors do not reflect all their related costs, as they do with pharmacists, since some of the expenses of the former are directly and separately reimbursed in respect of expenditure on staff and premises. In 1986-87 the cost per prescription (excluding VAT) of drugs and appliances dispensed by doctors and by pharmacists was £3·81 and £3·98 respectively.

Health Authorities (Costs)

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report, for St. Helens and Knowsley, Southport and Formby, South Sefton, Wandsworth, Islington, Central Manchester and Liverpool health authorities (a) the percentage of Health Service costs devoted to the administration of the service, (b) child mortality rates at birth and within a month of birth, (c) the number of registered nurses in special care baby units per 100 low birthweight births, (d) the district nurse contact rate for the over 65s, (e) the number of community mental and physical handicap nurses employed per resident in each authority, (f) the day-patient attendance rate for the over 65s and (g) the extent of meals-on-wheels provision.

Mr. Newton: Such information as is available centrally is in the tables. The hon. Member may wish to contact the health authority chairmen concerned for the other details he requires.

(a) Expenditure on headquarters administration as a proportion of total revenue expenditure

	Per cent.
St. Helens and Knowsley	3·44
Southport and Formby	4·68
South Sefton	3·27
Wandsworth	2·38
Islington	3·17
Central Manchester	2·67
Liverpool	2·92

Notes:

1. Expenditure on headquarters administration includes all current expenditure on the pay and pay related costs of staff of all disciplines (including general managers) employed at headquarters levels and their office costs and overheads. It excludes the cost of clerical and secretarial support staff employed in departments at hospital and unit levels: such costs are regarded as operational.
2. Information derived from the 1986-87 annual accounts (the latest available) of the health authorities concerned.

(b) Child mortality rates

The mortality rates quoted have slightly different criteria. The still birth rate is shown per 1,000 live and still births, whereas the neonatal (deaths in the first 28 days of life) rate is deaths per 1,000 live births. These rates have been calculated from all births ie including low weight births. The latest available data are for 1986.

Rates per 1,000 births

	Still births per 1,000 live and still births	All neonatal deaths per 1,000 live births
St. Helens and Knowsley	5·3	4·5
Southport and Formby	4·2	[1]9·3
South Sefton	4·9	4·9
Wandsworth	4·4	4·1
Islington	6·8	5·2
Central Manchester	9·4	6·3
Liverpool	6·1	5·0

[1] In Southport and Formby, where the birthrate is low, the comparatively high rate of neonatal deaths represents only 11 actual deaths in 1986.

(c) The number of registered nurses and midwives in special care baby units (at 30 September 1986)

	Whole-time equivalent per 100 low birthweight births[1]
St. Helens and Knowsley	2·2
Southport and Formby	8·0
South Sefton	3·2
Wandsworth	7·5
Islington	10·8
Central Manchester	26·6
Liverpool	3·9

(f) The day-patient attendance rate for the over 65s

Information, including the age of patients admitted to a hospital bed for treatment as a day case and regular day admissions will be available centrally for the first time later this year. For patients using NHS day care facilities, the specialty function classification will provide some indication of the age groups using the facility.

(g) Meals on wheels provision

Information on meals-on-wheels provision is not available in the precise form requested as data are by local authority area, which is not always conterminous with health authority area. The latest information for the relevant local authorities is given in the table.

Number of main meals provided for elderly and/or physically handicapped people during the year ended 31 March 1987

Health authority	Local authority	Meals at home Number
St. Helens and Knowsley	St. Helens	144,249
	Knowsley	61,018
Southport and Formby; South Sefton	Sefton	103,626
Wandsworth and part of Richmond, Twickenham and Roehampton (30 per cent. by population)	Wandsworth	382,065
Islington	Islington	268,467
Central Manchester, South Manchester, North Manchester	Manchester	735,936
Liverpool	Liverpool	404,103

Benefit Entitlement

Mr. Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of households entitled to (i) supplementary benefit and (ii) housing benefit which failed to claim benefit in 1987-88 and how many were pensioner households.

Mr. Portillo: The latest take-up estimates for supplementary benefit are for 1983 and those for housing benefit are for 1984. A convenient summary is shown on pages 272 and 273 of the 1988 public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 288). More detailed technical reports are available in the Library.

Child Care

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish a Bill as outlined in the 1987 White Paper 'The Law on Childcare and Family Services' (Cm. 62).

Mr. Newton: I cannot at present add to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on 28 October 1987 at columns 307-8.

Electro-convulsive Therapy

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each of the last three years for which figures are available (a) the number of cases where the Mental Health Commission has been asked to approve the treatment with electro-convulsive therapy of a patient detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983 and (b) the number of such cases in which the Mental Health Commission has recommended against such treatment.

Mrs. Currie: I have asked the Mental Health Act Commission to provide the hon. Member with this information.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services for each of the last three years for which figures are available, what was the number of patients treated with electro-convulsive therapy following a diagnosis of puerperal psychosis; and, in each case, what was the average number of treatments per patient.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the figures she has requested. Records of diagnoses of patients receiving electro-convulsive therapy are not collected centrally.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for each of the last three years for which figures are available, the number of patients in whose deaths electro-convulsive therapy was considered a contributory factor.

Mrs. Currie: The information is not available in exactly the form requested.

However, during 1985 and 1986, the number of deaths registered in England and Wales with "Failure in dosage in electroshock or insulin—shock therapy" (International Classification of Disease code E.873.4) mentioned as a cause of death on the death certificate was nil.

No "mentions" data for 1984 are available, but in that year no death was assigned an underlying cause of E873.4.

Lobotomies

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services for each of the last three years for which figures are available, what was the number of lobotomies performed in Britain.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information in the form she requested. The number of psychosurgical operations (including lobotomies—leucotomies) performed in neurosurgical units in England (including referrals from other parts of the British Isles) are as follows:

1984	1985	1986
10	21	15

Figures for Scotland and Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Legionnaire's Disease

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how often tests are carried out on hospital water supplies to detect Legionnaire's disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: In the absence of a quick test to measure the pressure of legionnella in water, we consider that the maintenance of hospital hot and cold water systems to standards recommended in a code of practice issued by the Department offers the best means of protection against infection by legionnella. Routine sampling is not recommended unless a water supply is suspected as being the source of an infection, because technical and scientific resources can be more effectively employed on preventive maintenance.

Single Payments

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was paid out in single payments to social security applicants in Lambeth in the financial year ended 31 March; and how much has been allocated under the social fund for the current year.

Mr. Portillo: The London borough of Lambeth is served by 10 local social security offices. The boundaries of these offices are not conterminous with those of the borough. Figures for single payment expenditure for the period 8 April 1987 to 10 April 1988 are given in the table. The figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

Office	Expenditure £
Balham	238,476
Battersea	202,006
Brixton	253,353
Camberwell	130,768

Peckham	168,065
Southwark	164,513
Streatham	486,924

Information on the social fund allocations to local offices for 1988-89 was contained in the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) on 4 November 1987 at columns 774-81.

Solvent Abuse

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children under the age of 16 years died as a result of solvent abuse in the most recent years for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie: The most complete data available come from a continuing study carried out by the department of clinical epidemiology and social medicine of St. George's hospital medical school, London.

This study—the national study of deaths associated with the abuse of volatile substances—collects data from a variety of sources, including death registrations and a survey of coroners' findings. It suggests that in 1985 there were 23, and in 1986 27 (provisional figure) such deaths of those aged under 16 in England and Wales.

Three Rivers (Electorate)

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will set out a table showing the 1988 electorate for each ward in the district of Three Rivers.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is as follows:

District of Three Rivers

Ward name	Parliamentary electorate on the 1988 register
South West Hertfordshire parliamentary constituency

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what further plans he has to oblige regional health authorities to put out to competitive tender their solicitors, architects, quantity surveyors and engineers services.

Mrs. Currie: We have no new central initiative in mind, but we do encourage regional health authorities to test on a regular basis the efficiency and cost-effectiveness of all their services and to consider the use of private contractors for operational activities. Under existing arrangements all National Health Service construction work and at least 75 per cent. of design work is undertaken on the basis of external contracts based on fee competition.

In-patients (Teaching Hospitals)

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, for the latest convenient year, the percentage of in-patients treated in each English teaching hospital who came from outside the health district in which that teaching hospital was located.

Mr. Newton: The available information is given in the table.

Estimated percentage of non-maternity, non-psychiatric cases treated in National Health Service teaching districts in England who are normally resident outside the district: 1986

North Sea Oil (Sub-contractors)

Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the extent of non-payment by sub-contractors on certain North sea oil platforms of national insurance contributions for weeks when employees are on leave.

Mr. Portillo: The Department does not hold central information on the extent of non-payment of national insurance contributions by individual employers on North sea oil platforms. However, if any employee is concerned about his position in national insurance, he can discuss this with his local social security office and the staff there will be pleased to advise or investigate.

Benefits

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated number of claimants who lost entitlement to increases of (a) unemployment benefit, (b) sickness benefit, (c) invalidity pension and (d) retirement pension, respectively, when section 10 of the Social Security Act 1988 came into force; and how many of them were women.

Mr. Scott: It is estimated that the total number of claimants who lost entitlement when section 10 of the Social Security Act 1988 came into force was 2,500, of whom 50 were women. The great majority of those losing entitlement are retirement pensioners and invalidity pensioners. Losses for other claimants are negligible.

Community Care

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what impact the Government expect regulation 19(3) of the Income Support Regulations 1987 to have on its community care policy.

Mr. Portillo: Regulation 19(3) of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987 provides definitions of establishments which are to be treated as residential care homes or nursing homes for income support purposes. These definitions do not substantively differ from those in force under supplementary benefit legislation and represent no change in the Government's policy on community care.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his answer to the hon. member for Stockport of 11 May, Official Report, columns 183-84, what steps he proposes to take to assess whether the factors he there sets out fully account for the disparities in administrative and clerical costs as between district health authorities; what steps he proposes to take to reduce such costs in all district health authorities to the levels achieved in those districts with the most efficient performance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: There are many factors which influence the level of administrative and clerical staffing. Only detailed scrutiny of each individual district can establish whether differences are justified or not. This is the job of NHS management but we have sought to help in two specific respects.

As part of the performance indicator package, DHAs and RHAs have been asked to undertake analyses of the past four years' indicators. These analyses, combined with local information, will form a basis for commentary to be presented to authority members and to be made available to local MPs and community health council members. This commentary should highlight changes over time and identify those main areas requiring further investigation.

In addition, we will shortly publish a report of a review of administrative and clerical staff which commends to health authorities ways of monitoring the numbers of such staff and makes suggestions for potential improvements in performance.

Cancer Hot-spots (Hull)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish in the Official Report the figures upon which the discovery of two new child cancer hot-spots on the Bransholme and Greatfield estate in Hull are based.

Mrs. Currie: I am aware that the East Yorkshire health authority is preparing a report on childhood cancers from 1974 to 1986. I understand initial indications are that the rates in the Bransholme and Greatfield census wards are not significantly elevated. I would refer the hon. Member to the chairman of the East Yorkshire health authority for further information.

HIV and AIDS

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish the report of the working group on the monitoring and surveillance of HIV infection and AIDS; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have today published the working group's report, and copies have been placed in the Library. We are grateful to Dr. Smith and to the members of the group for the very thorough work they have done.

The group has made a number of recommendations to improve existing arrangements for the reporting of test results, for studies based upon them, and for further steps to improve information about the prevalence of HIV infection and its spread. In particular, it has recommended a programme of antenatal testing, based on three large samples drawn from different parts of the country, with participation being voluntary, and provision being made for unnamed testing if an individual wished.

The Government accept all the group's recommendations in principle, and will be consulting interested bodies about their implementation. In respect of the proposal for antenatal testing, consultation will build on the experience of work already undertaken towards establishing antenatal testing in parts of Scotland, which we would seek to incorporate into the wider programme recommended by the working group.

In the Government's view, implementation of the group's recommendations will significantly improve the information needed both for planning services and for the continued development of measures to minimise the spread of the disease.

However, the Government are aware of a substantial body of opinion which believes that there is a greater likelihood of achieving these objectives through studies based on the testing of unnamed samples without specific consent—usually described as "anonymised testing"; and note that the working group itself recognises the possibility that this might in future be required. In view of this, and of the difficult ethical and legal issues associated with such testing, we consider it right that the issue should be the subject of further and wider public debate. We would welcome views by the end of August 1988.

Birmingham Children's Hospital

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list the number of job forums in which jobs for intensive care nursing staff at Birmingham children's hospital have been advertised since 17 February 1988; what response there has been; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the number of advertisements for intensive care nursing staff at Birmingham children's hospital carried (a) in the nursing press and (b) in the Nursing Times since 17 February; what response there has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 23 May 1988]: Since 17 February one two-day job forum has been held aimed at attracting nursing staff to the Birmingham children's hospital as a whole. Following this forum a number of nurse trainees expressed a firm interest in working at the hospital on completion of their training this summer.

A recruitment advertisement for trained nurses appeared in the Nursing Times on 9 March but received no response. Since earlier advertisements in the nursing press also had minimal success in recruiting nurses trained in intensive care, recruitment efforts will in future concentrate on the hospital's innovative 52-week teaching and experience package, under which nurses work as supernumaries in the intensive therapy unit and which has already attracted nine recruits; on a course for training post-graduate nurses in paediatric intensive care, which will be the first such course outside London; on a possible course to convert enrolled nurses to registered sick children's nurses; on increasing the output of training schools in the region from 56 to 77 registered sick children's nurses a year; on local press and radio appeals to mature registered sick children's nurses who had left the profession to return to nursing; and on future job forums as opportunities arise.

Widows (Income Support)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether a widow whose income exceeds her applicable amount for income support purposes might nevertheless live below income support level because the rate rebate taper makes no allowances for mortgage costs.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 23 May 1988]: Yes. This might happen in some cases where the income support assessment contains an amount for mortgage interest and where the person's income remains slightly above income support levels. All those actually on income support will receive a maximum rate rebate. The reason for this is that mortgage payments made by owner-occupiers are not an eligible housing cost for the purposes of housing benefit.

TRANSPORT

Military Explosives (Transport)

98. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to amend the Conveyance by Road of Military Explosives Regulations 1977.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 10 May at column 78.

Carlisle-Settle Railway

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many times he has travelled on the Carlisle to Settle railway, since his appointment as Secretary of State.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has not visited the line in his present capacity, but I have travelled on it on a number of occasions.

Historic Wrecks Advisory Committee

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's guidance to the historic wrecks advisory committee.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have placed in the Library a copy of the Department's booklet on historic wrecks, which contains a description of the committee's functions and how it fulfills them. No further guidance is supplied to the committee.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take into account the future requirement of operating British Aerospace 146 planes in and out of London City airport, when coming to a decision with regard to the east London river crossing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: Late representations were received at the inquiries into the east London river crossing on the possible future use of the British Aerospace 146 at London City airport. These objections were referred by the inspector without comment to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and myself. We shall take these representations into account in considering the inspector's report of the inquiry. The use of BA146 aircraft would require a variation in the planning consent for the airport.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he hopes to announce the decision of the inspector relating to the east London river crossing.

Mr. Channon: Soon.

Ferries (Stability)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the roll-on/roll-off ferries which operate in Scottish waters, indicating which routes they operate on and whether they comply with the proposed new IMO stability criteria;

(2) how many of the ferries which operate in Scottish waters were included in the recent IMO survey of standards of residual damage stability for passenger ships; and how many met the new IMO criteria.

Mr. David Mitchell: A list of the 56 roll-on/roll-off ferries that normally operate in Scottish waters, and the areas in which they operate, will be placed in the Library. All these ferries comply with the present international safety standards. The study into the standards of residual stability of passenger ships sponsored by my Department compared the standards attained by a representative sample of existing ships with the standards proposed for new ships, which are not yet in force. There are as yet no new IMO criteria.

Garages (Prosecutions)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the number of prosecutions, in each of the last three years, for giving a false description of work carried out by a motor garage.

Mr. Butcher: I have been asked to reply.

We have no information on the total number of prosecutions brought. However, the number of cases of successful prosecutions under section 14 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, relating to repairs or servicing of motor vehicles, as reported to the Office of Fair Trading by local trading standards departments, was as follows:

	Number
[1]1984-85	18
[1]1985-86	17
[1]1986-87	28

[1] In each case, the year covers the period October-September.

Breath Tests

Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will introduce legislation to resolve the difficulty which arises where police officers are able to stop drivers at random but are prohibited from requiring breath tests at random; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

The courts have made it clear that the police may use their power to stop under section 159 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 to stop vehicles at random. They may then require a breath test under section 7 of the Act where there is reasonable cause to suspect that a driver has alcohol in his body, has committed a moving traffic offence, or has been involved in an accident. The Government have at present no plans to introduce further legislation in this area.

DEFENCE

Maritime Strategy

17. Mr. Clay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals concerning maritime strategy he will be taking to the Eurogroup meeting of Defence Ministers in Brussels on 25 May.

61. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals concerning maritime strategy he will be taking to the Eurogroup meeting of Defence Ministers in Brussels on 25 May.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott).

Trident

18. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the latest cost of Trident nuclear weapons.

Mr. Sainsbury: One representation, in the form of a letter from a member of the public, has been received since the Secretary of State announced the revised Trident estimate in January this year.

28. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made on a system of communication to and from Trident submarines, and on the development of a control centre subject to political decision making.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 23 May 1988, at column 38.

Bramley Camp

19. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for defence in respect of how many acres of Bramley camp his Department intends to seek planning permission for housing development.

Mr. Freeman: There are three small areas of land, amounting to about 20 acres in all, for which we have no further use. These areas adjoin existing residential areas and discussions are taking place with the Basingstoke and Deane borough council planning officials to consider these sites in relation to the local plan. These discussions will also cover the possible release and future use of an area of railway sidings which are no longer used.

Defence Export Services Organisation

20. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the progress of the defence Export Services Organisation.

Mr. Sainsbury: As the defence White Paper makes clear, the Defence Export Services Organisation is a continuing success in its work of assisting defence manufacturers, large and small, in their drive for exports which contribute significantly to our national wealth and job opportunities.

NATO (nuclear Weapons)

21. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss nuclear matters.

25. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss nuclear matters.

79. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss nuclear matters.

92. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss nuclear matters.

Mr. Younger: The next meeting of NATO's nuclear planning group will take place in the autumn. I also expect to meet my NATO colleagues at the Defence Planning Committee in Brussels on 26/27 May when we shall be discussing a range of defence and security matters affecting the Alliance.

29. Mr. Allan Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts about battlefield and short-range nuclear weapons.

53. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts about battlefield and short-range nuclear weapons.

66. Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts about battlefield and short-range nuclear weapons.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 23 February at column 165.

Merchant Shipping (Wartime Use)

22. Mr. Heffer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed arrangements for the use of merchant shipping in time of war.

31. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed arrangements for the use of merchant shipping in time of war.

50. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed arrangements for the use of merchant shipping in time of war.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran).

Air Sea Rescue

23. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at which Royal Air Force bases he intends to retain air sea-rescue facilities.

30. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to receive the results of the review of search and rescue operations.

67. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to replace the Royal Air Force Wessex air-sea rescue helicopters.

68. Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline his plans for United Kingdom air-sea rescue coverage in the 1990s.

Mr. Freeman: I refer right hon. and hon. Members to the Adjournment debate on 23 May with my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker).

Ex-Government Employees (Outside Appointments)

24. Mr. McTaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about former civil servants and members of Her Majesty's forces accepting outside appointments with defence contractors.

32. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about former civil servants and members of Her Majesty's forces accepting outside appointments with defence contractors.

90. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about former civil servants and members of Her Majesty's forces accepting outside appointments with defence contractors.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland).

UK-USSR (Confidence-Building Measures)

26. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals for confidence-building measures he intends to put to the Soviet inspection team visiting the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down.

27. Mr. Boyes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals for confidence-building measures he intends to put to the Soviet inspection team visiting the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down.

86. Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals for confidence-building measures he intends to put to the Soviet inspection team visiting the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals for confidence-building measures he intends to put to the Soviet inspection team visiting the chemical defence establishment, Porton Down.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The exchange of visits between the chemical defence establishment at Porton Down and the Soviet chemical warfare facility at Shikhany, first proposed by the United Kingdom in 1986, will itself make a valuable contribution to confidence building. During the Soviet visit to Porton Down the talks will cover the full range of CW-related issues. We hope this will provide the opportunity for the Soviet Union to demonstrate the much greater openness about its CW capabilities necessary to build confidence in the context of the negotiations for a global CW ban.

Strategic Defence Initiative

33. Mr. Cartwright: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the total value of contracts placed with United Kingdom firms or institutions in connection with the United States strategic defence initiative.

Mr. Sainsbury: US$61·5 million.

HM Forces (Equal Opportunities)

34. Mr. Michael Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to extend monitoring of equal opportunties in Her Majesty's forces.

82. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to extend monitoring of equal opportunities in Her Majesty's forces.

40. Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to extend monitoring of equal opportunities in Her Majesty's forces.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) on 20 May 1988 at column 609.

Nuclear-capable Aircraft

35. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning nuclear-capable aircraft were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting.

56. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning nuclear-capable aircraft were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting.

65. Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning nuclear-capable aircraft were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting.

36. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning modernisation of nuclear weapons were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting.

44. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning modernisation of nuclear weapons were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation nuclear planning group meeting.

93. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions concerning modernisation of nuclear weapons were made at the last North Atlantic Treaty Organisation planning group meeting.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley).

Merchant Fleet

37. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will commission a study into the defence implications of the contraction in the merchant fleet.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The number of merchant vessels available in the categories required for defence purposes in an emergency is already closely monitored and careful consideration is given to any defence implications.

Type 23 Frigates

38. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been spent to date on the development of a computer system for the type 23 frigate.

43. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been spent to date on the development of a computer system for the type 23 frigate.

74. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been spent to date on the development of a computer system for the type 23 frigate.

Mr. Sainsbury: Expenditure to date is of the order of £35 million comprising some £30 million net expenditure on CACS4, and £5 million spent on the new command system for the type 23 frigate.

70. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the ordering of type 23 frigates.

Mr. Sainsbury: Since tenders were invited for up to four type 23 frigates in October, meetings have been held with three groups of hon. Members, one of which included local trade union representatives, and to date we have received letters from 12 hon. Members and one letter from a regional council.

In addition, I have replied to 12 questions in this House and the matter was raised during the debate on the Royal Navy on 3 March, at column 1242.

Procurement Expenditure

39. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of his Department's expenditure on procurement was spent in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland during the last year for which full figures are available.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Ministry's procurement expenditure in the United Kingdom on equipment in the financial year 1986-87 is estimated to have been distributed as follows:

	Per cent.
England	92
Scotland	5
Wales	2
Northern Ireland	1

Note: The above estimates are based on the location of final suppliers to the Ministry of Defence. They do not take account of the different location of subcontractors or of suppliers to the main contractors.

84. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's policy with regard to the regional distribution of procurement expenditure within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 10 November 1987 at column 158.

Sea King Helicopters

41. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he last reviewed the armed forces' requirements for Sea King helicopters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The armed forces' requirements for Sea King helicopters are kept constantly under review. In November 1987 orders were placed for seven Sea Kings for the Royal Navy to maintain front-line aircraft numbers.

Low-flying Aircraft

42. Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government or their North Atlantic Treaty Organisation allies are proposing measures (i) to protect the civilian population of the countries affected by low-flying exercises from accidents and damage and (ii) to compensate the victims of such accidents.

Mr. Freeman: There are well established procedures for compensating members of the public in cases where it is established that personal injury or damage to property has resulted from military aircraft activity. These arrangements are kept under review and are subject to revision where appropriate. All possible steps are taken to keep to a minimum the risks associated with this essential military training.

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if military aircraft operating in the United Kingdom low-flying system, outside the three designated tactical training areas, are permitted to descend below 250 ft minimum separation distance in special circumstances such as the run-in to targets during simulated attack or interception manoeuvres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Only within range areas, which fall within the physical boundaries of the United Kingdom low-flying system, but which are not part of the system in that they are designated avoidance areas for low-flying training, are aircraft permitted to descend below 250 ft minimum separation distance during the final approaches to a target.

Chemical warfare

45. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what scientific, technical and military information on chemical warfare related matters has been exchanged between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union.

62. Mrs. Clywd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what scientific, technical and military information on chemical warfare related matters has been exchanged between Britain and the USSR.

87. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what scientific, technical and military information on chemical warfare related matters has been exchanged between the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union.

91. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what scientific, technical and military information on chemical warfare related matters has been exchanged between Britain and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Ian Stewart: A wide variety of scientific, technical and military information on CW-related issues, relevant to the conclusion of a verifiable global CW ban, is exchanged on a multilateral basis at the conference on disarmament at Geneva, in which both the United Kingdom and the USSR are participants.

Ammunition Expenditure

46. Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department intends to spend on medium and large calibre ammunition in the present financial year.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our anticipated expenditure in this area for the present financial year was some £125 million.

Royal Army Veterinary Corps, Melton Mowbray

47. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made with the review of activities at the Royal Army Veterinary Corps, Melton Mowbray.

Mr. Freeman: The review to which my hon. Friend refers concerns the possible formation of a joint service dog school; there are currently two dog schools which are located at Melton Mowbray and RAF Newton. The review, which will also take account of the costs of the Army's equine functions at Melton Mowbray, should be completed in the summer.

Air Combat Facility (North Sea)

48. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to make a commitment to British Aerospace's proposed air combat manoeuvring instrumentation facility in the North sea.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have nothing to add to my reply of 11 May at column 134.

Donnington Central Ordnance Depot (Fire)

49. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost of the recent fire at Donnington central ordnance depot.

63. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost of the recent fire at the Donnington central ordnance depot.

64. Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost of the recent fire at the Donnington central ordnance depot.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his latest estimate of the cost of the recent fire at the Donnington central ordnance depot.

Mr. Freeman: The latest provisional estimate of the book value of the stock lost in the recent fire at COD Donnington is £147 million. The final estimate of the scale of the loss will depend on how much of the stock which survived proves to be salvageable.

Maritime Operations

51. Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are under consideration to the current concept of maritime operations.

54. Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are under consideration to the current concept of maritime operations.

60. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are under consideration to the current concept of maritime operations.

94. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are under consideration to the current concept of maritime operations.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Members to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 14 December 1987 at column 409, to which I have nothing to add.

Low-flying Exercises

52. Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received concerning low-flying exercises in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Between 1 March 1988 and 12 May 1988 the Ministry of Defence received 719 inquiries or complaints about low flying in the United Kingdom.

Soldiers' and Airmen's Scripture Readers Association (Centenary)

55. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to take part in the centenary celebrations of the Soldiers' and Airmen's Scripture Readers Association.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend was invited to attend the service to be held in the Guards chapel on 25 May to mark the 150th anniversary of the Soldiers' and Airmen's Scripture Readers Association but unfortunately had to decline as he will be out of the country on that day. However, a number of senior officers from the Army and RAF will attend.

Air Cadet Motor Gliders (Noise)

57. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of recent complaints he has received about the engine noise of air cadet motor gliders at volunteer gliding schools.

Mr. Freeman: Within the last six months the MOD has received a total of four complaints about engine noise of air cadet motor gliders at volunteer gliding schools. The four complaints were about activities at the following stations: RAF Little Rissington, RAF Henlow and RAF Halton.

RAF Aircraft (Commercial Demonstrations)

58. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he plans to take to monitor the use of RAF aircraft on commercial demonstrations.

Mr. Freeman: None. Every effort is made to respond helpfully to requests from United Kingdom companies to provide RAF aircraft for demonstrations in support of sales ventures. Well established procedures are followed in such circumstances. I will write further to my hon. Friend shortly.

Glenmoriston Estates, Inverness-shire

59. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will assess the defence implications of the proposed sale of Glenmoriston estates, Inverness-shire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The defence implications of this proposed sale are currently being assessed, but no decision has yet been taken and I am not, therefore, in a position to make a statement at present. I will write to the hon. Member when the situation has been clarified.

Military Supplies (Storage)

71. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will further review safety procedures for the storage of military supplies.

75. Ms. Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will further review safety procedures for the storage of military supplies.

88. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will further review safety procedures for the storage of military supplies.

89. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will further review safety procedures for the storage of military supplies.

Mr. Freeman: Safety procedures for the storage of military supplies are already subject to a process of continuous review.

Procurement

72. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received from defence industry representatives on the question of procurement over the last four weeks.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence receives many letters from the defence industry during the normal execution of his duties. He meets industrialists frequently, both formally and informally, and most recently chaired a meeting of the National Defence Industries Council on 17 May.

Nuclear-powered Submarines (Decommissioning)

76. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the decommissioning policy being adopted for nuclear-powered submarines.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on 9 May at column 2.

Cruise Missiles

77. Mr. Terry Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the United States Defence Secretary about sea-launched cruise missiles.

96. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the United States Defence Secretary about sea-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the United States Defence Secretary about sea-launched cruise missiles.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg).

Army Equipment (European Collaboration)

80. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of Army equipment is currently produced through European collaboration.

Mr. Sainsbury: Provision made in the Supply Estimates for 1988-89 for Army equipment being procured through collaborative projects involving our European allies amounts to 7 per cent. of the Army equipment budget.

Procurement (Collaborative Projects)

81. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of the United Kingdom defence procurement is presently spent on collaborative projects.

Mr. Sainsbury: About 15 per cent.

USSR (Nuclear Forces)

85. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on steps being taken by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to modernise its nuclear forces following the intermediate nuclear forces treaty banning land-based medium range weapons.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Soviet Union is continuing to modernise its whole array of nuclear-capable forces.

For details of the Soviet modernisation programmes I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) on 22 March at column 101 and to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1988".

Arms Levels

95. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts about conventional arms levels.

Mr. Younger: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett).

Tornado

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado F3 aircraft are currently held in storage at Royal Air Force, St. Athan; how many further aircraft of this type it is planned to place in storage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In order to facilitate an orderly build-up of the Tornado F3 force, a number of aircraft are held in storage at RAF St. Athan before being assigned to squadrons. This number fluctuates continuously; currently there are eight.

Royal Navy

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Royal Navy has a nuclear capability for shore bombardment.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I have nothing to add to the information contained in paragraph 302 of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1988".

Nuclear Weapons (Accidents)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements which relate to special arrangements between the United Kingdom and the United States of America covering accidents involving United States nuclear weapons on British soil.

Mr. Ian Stewart: There is a formal arrangement between the British and United States Governments which sets out the roles and responsibilities of the respective authorities in the highly unlikely event of an accident on United Kingdom territory involving a United States nuclear weapon.

NATO (Nuclear Planning Group)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the date and location of each meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's nuclear planning group since January 1980.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The dates and locations of NPG meetings since January 1980 are as follows:

	Location
3-4 June 1980	Bodo, Norway
13-14 November 1980	NATO Headquarters, Brussels
7-8 April 1981	Bonn, Federal Republic of Germany
20-21 October 1981	Gleneagles, Scotland
20-24 March 1982	Colorado Springs, United States of America
30 November 1982	NATO Headquarters, Brussels
22-23 March 1983	Vilamoura, Portugal
27-28 October 1983	Montebello, Canada
3-4 April 1984	Cesme, Turkey
11-12 October 1984	Stresa, Italy
26-27 March 1985	Luxembourg
29-30 October 1985	NATO Headquarters, Brussels
20-21 March 1986	Wurzburg, Federal Republic of Germany
21-22 October 1986	Gleneagles, Scotland
14-15 May 1987	Stavanger, Norway
3-4 November 1987	Monterey, United States of America
27-28 April 1988	NATO Headquarters, Brussels

NATO Defence Ministers (Meetings)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what meetings of North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Defence Ministers he plans to attend in the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend will attend the ministerial meetings of the Eurogroup and the defence planning committee in Brussels from 25 to 27 May. He expects to attend further meetings of the Eurogroup, the defence planning committee and the nuclear planning group this autumn.

NATO

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the Royal Navy's conventional warfare role within the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to paragraph 302 of volume 1 of the "Statement of the Defence Estimates 1988".

Rating Reform

Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions he has issued to members of the armed forces about registration under the community charge legislation.

Mr. Freeman: Members of the armed forces in Scotland who receive community charge inquiry forms have been instructed that they should fill them in and return them to registration officers in the normal way. No instructions have yet been issued in respect of England and Wales.

Defence Spending

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the percentage of gross domestic product allocated to defence in each of the years 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information requested is as follows:

	Per cent.
1987-88	4·4
1988-89	4·2
1989-90	4·1

The reducing percentage largely reflects forecast growth in GDP.

Gibraltar (Incident)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many bomb disposal units or military personnel with expertise in this field were present in Gibraltar on Sunday 6 March; how many bomb disposal and other personnel this involved; how many of these were sent to Gibraltar in expectation of a possible Provisional IRA bomb attack; and on what dates these units or personnel arrived in Gibraltar.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It is not the policy to comment on operational matters.

Bomb Disposal Units (Gibraltar)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many bomb disposal units are normally stationed in Gibraltar at any one time; and how many personnel this involves.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Personnel providing a military bomb disposal capability are permanently based in Gibraltar. For reasons of security it is not our practice to give details of establishments of military personnel.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Universities

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish in the Official Report a table, covering the years 1979-80 to 1990-91, which provides a summarised revenue account for universities in Great Britain, distinguishing (a) gross expenditure and (b) income, differentiating student fees paid by the United Kingdom Government, students' fees paid directly by United Kingdom students, overseas students' fees, research and contract income from other United Kingdom Government sources, research and contract income from charitable foundations, research and contract income from the United Kingdom private sector, other research and contract income, public donations, trading profit, or miscellaneous sales income declared gross and other miscellaneous income and (c) net expenditure on a definition consistent with the entries for current expenditure in universities in table 12·1 of Cm 288-II.

Mr. Jackson: Universities' income and expenditure in years up to the academic year 1985-86, the latest for which the information is available, is set out in successive annual editions of "University Statistics: Volume Three, Finance". Copies are in the Library. The Government make no forecast of these figures.

Free School Meals

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils in (a) Durham city and (b) the county of Durham lost their entitlement to free school meals in the last month.

Mr. Dunn: Information for Durham city is not separately available. In October 1987 about 8,660 pupils in the county of Durham received free school meals because their families were in receipt of family income supplement, or through the operation of LEA discretion. From 11 April the families of those in the former category will receive a cash benefit of £2·55 per week throughout the year under the new family credit scheme, which will also cover many in the latter category. Children from families in receipt of, or who are themselves in receipt of, income support (the successor to supplementary benefit) continue to be eligible for free school meals. Nationally it is estaimated that about 100,000 more school age children will benefit under the family credit scheme compared with those who currently receive free school meals under family income supplement and LEA discretionary schemes combined.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has of how many children within the Leicestershire education authority area have lost entitlement to free school meals as a result of the benefit changes which came into effect in April.

Mr. Dunn: In October 1987 about 4,840 pupils in Leicestershire received free school meals because their families were in receipt of family income supplement, or through the operation of LEA discretion. From 11 April this year the families of those in the former category receive a cash benefit of £2·55 per week throughout the year under the new family credit scheme, which will also cover many in the latter category. Children from families in receipt of, or who are themselves in receipt of, income support (the successor to supplementary benefit) continue to be eligible for free school meals. Nationally it is estimated that about 100,000 more school age children will benefit under the family credit scheme compared with those who currently receive free school meals under family income supplement and LEA discretionary schemes combined.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Legislation (Amendments)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many non-government amendments have been carried at the Committee stage of Government-sponsored public Bills for each year since 1979.

Mr. Wakeham: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

PRIME MINISTER

Top Salaries Review Body

Mr. Watts: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the chairmanship of the Top Salaries Review Body.

The Prime Minister: Lord Plowden has advised me that he will wish to retire as chairman of the Top Salaries Review Body after it has completed its next report in 1989. I shall accept his resignation with great regret and I wish to place on record the Government's gratitude for his outstanding service as a member of the Top Salaries Review Body since 1977, and as chairman for the last seven years.

I am glad to be able to announce that Sir David Nickson has agreed to take over the chairmanship from Lord Plowden and to serve as a member of the review body for its 1988-89 review.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Under-Age Drinking (Prosecutions)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of prosecutions in each of the last five years for under-age drinking against publicans and juveniles.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, relates to prosecutions under sections 169(1) and 169(2) of the Licensing Act 1964, and is given in the following table. Data for 1987 are not yet available.

Persons proceeded against for offences under sections 169(1) and 169(2) of the Licensing Act 1964

England and Wales					Number of persons
	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Prosecutions under:
Section 169(1)	323	307	314	274	296
Section 169(2)	1,931	1,627	1,171	790	949

Prison Officers (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with the Prison Officers Association to seek to resolve the action by prison officers at Wandsworth prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Meetings have taken place recently between officials and the Prison Officers' Association aimed at the resolution of the current dispute. A further meeting has been arranged for today.

Guernsey (Employment Law)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on Thursday 5 May, whether the state of Jersey has passed a protection of employment opportunities law; if it has been seen by his Department; when the state of Guernsey plans to discuss similar legislation which would involve restrictions on United Kingdom citizens; what action he proposes to take to protect their interests; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Protection of Employment Opportunities (Jersey) Law 1988 was examined by the Home Office before my right hon. Friend advised Her Majesty The Queen in Council on the matter of Royal Assent which was given on 17 February 1988. The law enables the island authorities to make regulations, should the need arise, to protect employment opportunities in prescribed categories of employment for those having a connection with the Bailiwick. At present, no such regulations have been made and I understand none is planned in the foreseeable future. The freedom of movement of British citizens between the United Kingdom and the island is not curtailed by the Law.

I understand that the states of Guernsey intend to debate legislation, which might include matters relating to employment controls, in the near future. As with Jersey, should any such measures be proposed, they will be examined by the Home Office in the light of the need to ensure that those with close links with the island have adequate opportunities for employment.

Civil Defence

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of installation of the new message switch system in local authority emergency centres.

Mr. John Patten: A limited scale of equipment has been installed in one county in each of the home defence regions, except London, and additional installations have taken place in regions 4, 7 and 10.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement of the performance of Chernikeef Telecommunications in the provision of message switch equipment for local authority emergency centres.

Mr. John Patten: It is not the practice to comment on matters which are commercially confidential.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether his Department will meet grant-aid requirements incurred by the installation of the new message switch system in local authority emergency centres;

(2) why expenditure relating to the installation of the new message switch system in local authority emergency centres is eligible for 100 per cent. grant-aid at county level installations but only 75 per cent. grant-aid at district level installations.

Mr. John Patten: Subject to prior approval, adaption work necessary for the installation of civil defence communications equipment at local authority emergency centres is eligible for grant aid at the relevant rate. Differential rates of grant were determined at a time when shire district centres contained little or no Home Office communications equipment, and it was decided that available funds should be concentrated elsewhere. The policy is under review.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he expects any additional costs to be incurred as a result of problems encountered during the installation and commissioning of the new message switch system in local authority emergency centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No, although some additional costs may arise in connection with the provision of extra features in the equipment specification.

Satellite Television

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has concerning the likely schemes or proposals for satellite television services capable of being received in the United Kingdom which are the responsibility of (a) companies or organisations subject to United Kingdom legislation, (b) not in (a) above, but subject to legislation of the European Economic Community, and (c) not susceptible to either (a) or (b) above; and if he will make a statement concerning any activities or initiatives by Her Majesty's Government concerning international agreements concerning the standards of broadcast material in respect of (c) above.

Mr. Renton: There is a distinction between services transmitted by satellite for reception and distribution via cable systems, and services for direct reception in the home. Services of the former type are subject to regulation by the Cable Authority under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984 in the same way as other cable services. Since May 1985 it has, however, been open to anyone to obtain a licence for the direct reception of any satellite programme service, whether primarily intended for cable distribution or not.

Services broadcast direct to the home by satellite and not distributed on cable are not subject to Cable Authority regulation. I am aware of two current schemes for such services. British Satellite Broadcasting Ltd.(BSB) has been awarded the contract by the Independent Broadcasting Authority to provide a three-channel direct broadcasting by satellite service for the United Kingdom as part of its television broadcasting services under the Cable and Broadcasting Act 1984 and the Broadcasting Act 1981. BSB plans to launch its service in autumn 1989.

The Luxembourg-based company, Societe Europeenne des Satellites, plans to launch the Astra medium-powered satellite to provide a 16-channel service to Northern Europe, including the United Kingdom. Up to 11 channels are likely to be in English. I understand that Astra hopes to start its service towards the end of 1988 or early in 1989.

In addition, I understand that the European Telecommunications Satellite Organisation (EUTELSAT) has undertaken a feasibility study, in collaboration with the European Space Agency, into the possible implementation of a European satellite for direct broadcasting. EUTELSAT has yet to make a decision as to whether to proceed.

The Government are continuing to play an active part in the Council of Europe in negotiations on a draft convention on transfrontier broadcasting. The purpose of the convention will be to facilitate the transfrontier transmission and retransmission of television programme services that comply with prescribed minimum standards. The Government are seeking to ensure that the code of standards is compatible with the United Kingdom's national standards on taste and decency. It is hoped that the convention can be agreed in time for it to be open for signature and ratification at the Stockholm conference of European broadcasting Ministers in November.

Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act (Prosecutions)

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prosecutions have been brought under the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act in the most recent years for which figures are available;

(2) how many convictions have been recorded under the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act in the most recent years for which figures are available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information available to me, which may be incomplete, shows no prosecutions under the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act 1985 in 1985 and six prosecutions in 1986, two of which resulted in convictions.

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to increase the sentences available to the courts under the Intoxicating Substances (Supply) Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No. We consider the existing maximum penalties—six months' imprisonment or a fine of £2,000, or both—to be adequate.

Departmental Employees (Registered Disabled)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of employees of his Department is registered disabled.

Mr. Hurd: One hundred and fifty three members of staff are registered disabled. They represent 0·4 per cent. of all staff, including the prison service in England and Wales.

Police Air Support Units

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost to the public funds of the Home Office sponsored experiment carried out by the West Midlands police air support unit in February over a stretch of the M42.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Home Office share of the cost of the three patrol flights over the M42 in February was £1,064. There were no additional police costs incurred.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans for further sponsored experiments by his Department involving police air support units being used for road traffic purposes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No, but we shall be considering this matter again when we have received the report on the recently completed experiment.

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 18 May, when he intends to reach a conclusion on the outcome of the experiment of using police air support units for road traffic purposes; and if he will make it his policy to make an oral statement to the House when he has reached a decision.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A report on the experiment, which formed a minor part of an evaluation of the cost-effectiveness of the midlands police air operation, is being prepared. I shall write to my hon. Friend when it is available.

Lonrho plc, Blarg and Contargo

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police for the City of London as to whether inquiries into the Liechtenstein subsidiaries of Lonhro plc, Blarg and Contargo have now been completed; and whether the papers have been referred to the Crown Prosecution Service.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that the papers have now been referred to the Crown Prosecution Service.

Police Officers' Notebooks

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of 18 May, Official Report, column 462, if, in the light of the acquittal of eight defendants at Knightsbridge Crown court on 20 May, following the sending of the log books of police officers involved for forensic examination after irregularities were found, he will now reconsider his refusal to adopt the proposal to time-stamp police officers' notebooks where it is intended that the contents of these notebooks are to be used as evidence in court proceedings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The circumstances which led to the acquittal are being investigated by the metropolitan police under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority.

It would be wrong to make any comment or decision on any matter which may be covered by that investigation until it has been completed.

Bail Information Schemes

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received a report on the pilot bail information schemes set up in 1987.

Mr. Hurd: The Vera Institute of Justice has today published its report on eight pilot bail information schemes which were established during 1987 under the auspices of the Association of Chief Officers of Probation. The object of these schemes is to provide the Crown Prosecution Service with verified information about defendants, for example, on accommodation or community ties, which is relevant to the decision on whether to oppose bail.

The report shows that the schemes enabled the Crown Prosecution Service to take better informed decisions on whether to oppose bail or not. This in turn enabled the courts in the pilot areas to make more use of bail, without any increase in the failure rate of those on bail.

I am now urgently considering how best we can build on the experience of these schemes in co-operation with the courts, the Crown Prosecution Service, the police and probation service.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

Prisons (Opticians)

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why Liverpool prison has been without the services of an optician for eight months; and why it was four months before the vacancy was advertised.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The visiting optician to Liverpool prison resigned without notice last October. Local medical management sought to arrange a temporary appointment but experienced difficulty in identifying a suitable optician. In the meantime, the matter was referred to prison service headquarters for local advertising to be arranged. Regrettably, the advertisements were considerably delayed by staff sickness and work pressures in the personnel division concerned.

Throughout the period in which the prison was without the service of a visiting optician, optical referrals were made as appropriate to the visiting consultant ophthalmologist.

A visiting optician has now been appointed and commenced work on 23 May.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what procedure is used to ensure that prisoners can have eye examinations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A prisoner who requests optical treatment will be examined by the medical officer who will refer him to the optician if he considers that to be medically appropriate.

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons are currently without the services of an optician.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Department is not aware that any establishment is without such a service.

Police Interviews (Tape Recording)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to when tape recording facilities will be installed for police interviews in the Isle of Wight.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that a phased programme to install tape recording facilities at police stations throughout the whole area served by the Hampshire constabulary is well under way. Work to equip interview rooms at police stations in Newport and Shanklin on the Isle of Wight has already begun, and work will start shortly at Ryde and Cowes.

Community Radio

Mr. Tom Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce further details on the community radio stations licence procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The position remains as set out in my replies to various questions on 27 January from the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) at columns 251-54.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Serious Fraud Office

Mr. Hind: To ask the Attorney-General whether any changes will be made to the serious fraud office's cash limit and running cost limit for 1988-89.

The Attorney-General: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit on class XI, vote 12, will be increased by £606,000 from £5,480,000 to £6,086,000 and the running costs limit by £606,000 from £4,174,000 to £4,780,000. It was originally hoped that the serious fraud office, in line with other departments, would be able to restrict its expenditure to the provision agreed during the 1987 public expenditure survey. It is not clear that this will not be possible, the PES provision having necessarily been agreed at a stage in the office's development when precise information about its costs—particularly those relating to accommodation—was not available. No net increase to public expenditure results from this change as the cash limit increase will be charged to the 1988-89 reserve.

ENERGY

Energy Efficiency (Scotland)

55. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the promotion of energy efficiency in Scotland.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The Government have achieved considerable success in encouraging the efficient use of energy in all sectors in Scotland. There are now over 1,000 energy managers in Scotland. Grants of about £0·7 million have been given for energy surveys which have identified potential estimated savings of almost £20 million per year. In addition, through the energy efficiency demonstration scheme, £2·1 million has been provided to test new energy-saving technologies. In the domestic sector, 412,000 grants totalling just under £9·25 million have been provided through the homes insulation scheme. On 11 May I opened a successful conference in Glasgow on energy efficiency in commercial properties in Glasgow.

Nirex

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what are the Government's intentions for ownership and management of Nirex following privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Present expectations are that the Central Electricity Generating Board's shareholding in UK Nirex Ltd. will pass to the successor operator of CEGB nuclear power stations. The management of the company is a matter for the company and its shareholders.

TRANSPORT

A49 (Bartington Crossroads)

Mr. Goodlad: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the traffic lights scheme at the Bartington crossroads on the A49 to be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: During this financial year. Work will start as soon as design and land entry details are finalised.

Ferries Safety Steering Committee

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish in the Official Report the payments made to (a) Captain Tony Barrett, director and general manager of P and O European Transport Services Ltd., and (b) other members of the steering committee investigating safety measures for British roll-on/roll-off ferries.

Mr. David Mitchell: No payments are made to members of the steering committee other than expenses for travelling and subsistence.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will remove Captain Tony Barrett from the steering committee investigating safety measures for British roll-on/roll-off ferries.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Tolls

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish in the Official Report a list of road, bridge and tunnel facilities in each of the four countries of the United Kingdom for which tolls are levied, with a note for each entry of the name and address of the responsible authority; whether it produces published accounts for that specific facility; which Minister is responsible for authorising changes in such tolls and on which (i) public expenditure programme and (ii) class, vote and subhead, the toll revenue and associated expenditure is to be found.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I can answer for tolled facilities in England.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is responsible for the Severn bridge. Toll revenue and associated expenditure there is part of the roads public expenditure programme and appears in class VIII, vote 1, under subheads A1.7—new construction and renewals; A1.8—toll and operating equipment; B1.5—toll collection and breakdown service; and B2.1—toll revenue.

Toll revenue and associated expenditure at other crossings does not appear in the roads public expenditure programme. The Secretary of State is responsible for authorising changes in the tolls on a number of other bridges, floating bridges and roads. Details of ownership and accounting arrangements are not readily available for all minor crossings and roads. The major estuarial crossings in England, for which accounts are published annually and the authorities responsible for those crossings, are as follows:

A40 (Improvement)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost figure used for the acquisition of publicly owned land in the metropolitan green belt for the purpose of enabling the A40 improvement scheme to be undertaken at the junction with Long Lane, Hillingdon.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: At the 1987 public inquiry the total cost of all the land, including Hillingdon station, needed for this scheme was estimated at £3·375 million. No separate estimate was made for metropolitan green belt land. The actual purchase price will be a matter for negotiation with the landowners concerned.

Cars and Motor Cycles (Statistics)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many cars and how many motor cycles were registered and used on the roads of the United Kingdom in each of the last five years; and how many were involved in road accidents with (a) other vehicles, (b) no other vehicles involved and (c) pedestrians in each of the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested for the last five years for which complete road accident data are available, is given in the table:

Cars and motor cycles: Great Britain: 1982 to 1986

	New registrations	Currently licensed vehicles	Total involved in single vehicle accidents	Total involved in multiple vehicle accidents	Total colliding with a pedestrian

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Single Market (Competition Rules)

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if, in the light of his Department's promotion of the European single market, he will bring forward proposals for revising competition rules so as to be based on the European Community rather than the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement on the timescale for such reforms.

Mr. Alan Clark: Proposals for reform of restrictive trade practices legislation were published in my Department's Green Paper of March 1988, Cm. 331. These envisage a system which will be broadly consistent with the equivalent Community rules. The Government are participating fully in working party discussions of the draft EC proposals for a merger control regulation. It is expected that progress will be reviewed by the Council in June.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what, for each year since 1975, was the percentage change in the balance of trade in manufacturing goods of Belgium, Denmark, France, Holland, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, West Germany and Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: As the sign of the balance can vary from year to year, it is not appropriate to measure changes in the balance of trade in percentage terms. The balances in US dollars are in the table:

Crude balance of trade in manufactures[1] (US$ Billion)

	Belgium/ Luxem-bourg	Denmark	France	Nether-lands	United Kingdom	United States of America	Federal Republic of Germany	Japan

Regional Development Grants

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the level of regional development grant allocated, by region, for each financial year from 1979-80 to 1987-88, what these figures are as a percentage of the total budget; and what they were in cash terms.

Mr. Atkins: Expenditure on regional development grant by English region, and as a percentage of the RDG total for England, in the financial years 1979-80 to 1987-88 is as follows:

£ million (percentage of England total in brackets)

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88[2]

[1] Negligible (that is, less than £50,000).
[2] Provisional.

Mr. Blair: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the level of regional development grant allocated to each of the counties of Cleveland, Cumbria, Durham, Northumberland and Tyne and Wear, for each financial year from 1979-80 to 1987-88, in cash terms.

Mr. Atkins: Expenditure on regional development grant in the areas and financial years requested was as follows:

£ million

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88

Note:
1987-88 data are provisional.

Chemical Weapon Detection Kits

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will lift the restrictions on the sales and export of chemical weapon detection kits to enable humanitarian aid to be given to victims and potential victims of chemical attack; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. Equipment specially designed for detection of chemical weapons is controlled under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1987. There is no absolute ban on export. Applications for licences to export such goods are carefully considered on their merits depending upon the destination and the potential end user.

Joint Ventures (Soviet Union)

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, what assessment he has made of the implications for British industry of the clauses relating to joint ventures between Soviet and Western enterprises in the Soviet law on state enterprises which came into effect on 1 January.

Mr. Alan Clark: Soviet legislation permitting joint ventures with Western companies was introduced in January 1987 and amended in October 1987 to take account of some concerns expressed by potential Western participants. My Department and the British embassy in Moscow both constantly monitor the available information and provide advice to United Kingdom companies considering the possibility of joint ventures with a Soviet partner. It is for individual companies themselves to decide whether joint ventures are in their best commercial interests, and to negotiate terms which are acceptable to both partners. So far, two United Kingdom companies have signed such contracts, and several more are under active discussion.

Enterprise Zones (Soviet Union)

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has received any proposals from the Soviet Government for British investment and involvement in the establishment of enterprise zones in that country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No proposals for British investment or involvement in the establishment of enterprise zones in the USSR have been received from the Soviet Government. If any are received in the future, we shall study them with interest.

Anglo-Soviet Trade

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give the figures for the amount of official credit to finance Anglo-Soviet trade for each year between 1975 and 1987; and what information he has about any additional credit provided to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is not the practice of this or previous Governments to reveal the amount of official credit guaranteed by ECGD to individual countries. Figures for business insured and exports insured by area are published in ECGD's Summary of Audited Trading Results 1986-87. For information on other credit provided to the USSR one would need to approach those financial institutions involved.

Guinness plc

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the report of the inspectors appointed to investigate the affairs of Guinness plc will be delayed until completion of the associated criminal prosecutions.

Mr. Maude: Yes.

House of Fraser (Holdings) plc

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he now expects the inspectors appointed to investigate the affairs of House of Fraser (Holdings) plc to report.

Mr. Maude: The investigation continues, but I am unable to say when a report will be received.

Furniture (Fire Safety)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he has received any representations from officials or Ministers of European Community member states concerning the new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: The only official approach to the Government on this subject of which I am aware has been from the Italian embassy in London. As a result a discussion of the implications of the draft regulations for Italian suppliers of furnishing fabrics took place on 9 May.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what steps he has taken to discover the extent to which the pattern book industry has the capacity to replace the pattern books of furnishing fabric suppliers within the proposed time scale for the introduction of new furniture fire safety legislation;

(2) what assessment he has made of the cost to the suppliers of soft furnishing fabric of replacing pattern books when the new furniture fire safety regulations are implemented;

(3) what assessment he has made of the amount of time that small suppliers of soft furnishing fabric will require in order to replace their pattern books prior to the introduction of new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: I have received representations on these subjects and I am taking them into account in my consideration of possible changes to the draft regulations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what technological assistance will be provided by his Department in order to help suppliers of soft furnishing fabric to conform with the requirements of the new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: Detailed technological assistance is available in industry from many furniture manufacturers, from the research associations for the furniture industry and textile suppliers, from fire retardant processing companies, from independent consultants and from test houses. Many of these bodies have done a great deal of work in the past in readiness for the announcement of a date when match resistance will be required and are ready to assist fabric suppliers in meeting the requirement.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) in how many domestic fires in each of the last five years furniture has been judged to be the point of ignition;

(2) in how many domestic fires in which the ignition point was judged to be furniture death has resulted from (a) burns and (b) fumes from furniture foam, in each of the last five years;

(3) how many people have died in domestic fires in each of the last five years; and how many of those deaths were judged to have been caused by (a) burns and (b) fumes from furniture foam.

Mr. Butcher: The last five full years' statistics give the following figures for fires where the material first ignited was upholstered furniture or covers:

Year	Number
1982	3,554
1983	3,325
1984	3,571
1985	3,551
1986	3,660

The numbers of deaths resulting from fires in which upholstered furniture was judged to be the item first ignited for the last available five years' statistics are as follows:

Year	Number
1982	145
1983	133
1984	148
1985	146
1986	156

I am not able at this point to provide specific data concerning cause of death for these, but there seems no reason to suppose that there is any disparity in the breakdown in the causes of death between these furniture fires and the general fire figures which are as follows:

Total Fires in Occupied Buildings

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Death due to
Burns, number	258	249	262	281	300
as a percentage	33	31	32	30	33
Gas or Smoke asphyxiation, number	520	553	553	655	615
as a percentage	67	69	68	70	67

Accordingly the estimated answer to question (3) is as follows:

Fires in upholstered furniture

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Death due to
Burns	48	41	47	44	51
Gas or smoke	97	92	101	102	105

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many representations he has so far received concerning furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: I have received about 260 representations about the draft regulations circulated on 1 March.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what funding will be provided by his Department in order to assist the suppliers of soft furnishing fabric to conform to new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: All worthwhile proposals for financial assistance towards the development of products which make a contribution to consumer safety, such as chemical treatments which make textiles more resistant to fire, receive sympathetic consideration provided that such proposals meet the criteria for R and D policy set out in the White Paper.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment his Department has made of the effect that the new furniture fire safety regulations will have on European Community trade after 1992.

Mr. Butcher: All suppliers of furniture, components, and furnishings to the British market will compete on an equal basis. It is possible that some continental suppliers will find the British market less attractive than they do at present, since our legal requirements for fire resistance of furniture will be so far ahead of those in the rest of Europe. But differences already exist and do not inhibit trade within the Community. I am satisfied that our new regulations will not have the effect of erecting new barriers to trade, in contravention of the treaty of Rome.

As for any effect on British exports, the regulations will not apply to goods destined for export. Some exporters of furnishing textiles have claimed that the effect of the draft regulations would be to require them to offer separate ranges of fabrics for the home and export trades and that this would involve unacceptable extra costs, so that their export business would in practice be adversely affected. I am taking this possibility into account in my consideration of possible changes to the draft regulations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the overall cost for soft furnishing suppliers of meeting the new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: All proposals for new regulations are subject to compliance cost assessment, a formal procedure carried out by professional economists within the DTI and designed to establish whether the compliance costs to industry, and to consumers, are proportionate to the benefits which the regulations will bring.

A correct assessment of costs will depend on the final detail of the regulations to be determined in the near future.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what steps he has taken to discover the extent to which the capacity and the proven technology exist for the full variety of furnishing fabrics to conform to the new furniture fire safety regulations;

(2) what assessment his Department has made of the effects of present fire retardant treatments on high quality textiles.

Mr. Butcher: The objective of the draft regulations is to reduce the risk of fire associated with upholstered furniture and bedding. There is therefore no question of tailoring them to enable the full variety of furnishing fabrics now commercially available to conform. On the contrary, it will be necessary for suppliers of furnishing fabrics to modify the range of products which they offer. The majority of furnishing fabrics now in use can be effectively treated to make them match-resistant and still viable in other respects such as appearance and durability. I accept that some high quality textiles may be adversely affected, for example, in appearance. I am considering the ways in which the regulations may be modified in order to take account of consumer preferences for fabrics which present problems in this respect. But the industry should recognise that a reduction in consumer choice is part of the price to be paid for increased safety.

DEFENCE

Falkland Islands

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military projects undertaken by the Government in the Falkland Islands and the cost of each to date both in current and 1988 prices.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 20 May 1988]: The two major military works projects were the construction of the airfield at Mount Pleasant, and the works undertaken to concentrate the garrison at Mount Pleasant, for which the cash costs were about £300 million and £110 million respectively. The costs at September 1987 prices were about £370 million and £130 million respectively.

SCOTLAND

Electricity Industry

18. Mr. Millan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure that the Scottish electricity industry, if privatised, will not fall under foreign control.

Mr. Rifkind: The Government are considering whether any special share arrangements are required for the privatised electricity industry. Our decision will be announced in due course.

42. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to make a definitive statement on the Government's strategic priorities for the electricity supply industry, as foreshadowed in his White Paper, Cm. 327.

Mr. Rifkind: Discussions with the Scottish electricity boards on the future structure of the privatised industry and a range of other related issues are continuing. I will announce the outcome of these deliberations in due course.

47. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further consultations he has undertaken on the privatisation of the electricity industry.

Mr. Lang: Detailed discussions with the Scottish electricity boards on a wide range of issues relating to privatisation are continuing on a regular basis. Representatives of customers and employees are also being consulted about matters of concern to them.

Job Creation

19. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the level of job creation in Scotland over the past five years.

Mr. Lang: Comprehensive figures on the level of job creation in Scotland are not available. However, in the period April 1983 to March 1988, offers of regional selective assistance (RSA) were associated with the creation of 48,000 new jobs, and the safeguarding of a further 32,000 jobs.

Housing Benefit

20. Mr. Buchan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from Scottish local authorities about the impact of changes in the housing benefit system on the application of the Government's housing policies in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Seven letters from individual local authorities, and one from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have included reference to the impact of housing benefit changes along with other comments on the Government's housing proposals.

24. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the impact of recent changes in the housing benefit system on the objectives set out in his White Paper "Housing in Scotland" (Cm. 242).

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The changes made recently to the housing benefit system ensure that housing benefit is better targeted to those who need it. This will help them to take advantage of the new opportunities for renting being provided by the Housing (Scotland) Bill.

31. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning the effects on local government in Scotland of the recent alterations to the system of housing benefit payments.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Representations on the reformed housing benefit system, including the most recent changes, have been received from local authorities and members of the public. In addition, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have had discussions over the last year with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities about the new system as part of our regular round of meetings on local government finance.

54. Mr. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes will occur in the level of rate support grant paid to local authorities by his Department as a result of the alterations in the system of housing benefit payments.

Mr. Lang: The costs of preparing for the new system of housing benefit payments were met through a 100 per cent. specific grant. There was therefore no direct effect on rate support grant.

Devolution

21. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on devolving political decision-making on exclusively Scottish matters from Westminster to Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Member must know that the Scottish Office already has responsibility for a very wide range of Government functions in Scotland.

South of Scotland Electricity Board

22. Mr. Eadie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to meet the chairman of the South of Scotland Electricity Board to discuss electricity generation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the chairman of the South of Scotland Electricity Board from time to time to discuss a wide range of issues affecting the industry, although he has no immediate plans for a meeting.

Hospital Catering and Cleaning Services

23. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made with the privatisation of hospital catering and cleaning services; and if he proposes to seek further powers in this connection.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Health boards are making good progress with the current phase of competitive tendering and are now seeking tenders for domestic and catering contracts. No additional powers are required in this area.

Rating Reform

25. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the clergy over the impact of the poll tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received 81 representations from the clergy and church organisations since the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill was enacted in May last year. These representations covered a range of issues related to the introduction of the community charge including the effects of rating reform on church buildings, and the effects of the community charge on members of religious communities and on ministers of religion and their families.

27. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library copies of all written guidance he has issued to community charge registration officers.

Mr. Lang: The procedural requirements for the community charge registration system are fully set out in the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 and the regulations which have been made under it. Copies of the departmental circulars drawing the attention of local authorities to the Act and the regulations have been placed in the Library.

29. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the latest numbers registering for exemption from the poll tax on the basis of returns to community charge registration officers.

Mr. Lang: This information is not available centrally.

30. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to what level of community charge registration has been reached in the Highland region.

Mr. Lang: Detailed information on the progress of community charge registration is not available centrally.

41. Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many letters concerning poll tax registration his Department has received from members of the public since 1 April.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received 144 such letters since 1 April.

48. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions have taken place between his Department and community charge registration officials concerning the process of registration for poll tax purposes since 1 April.

51. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has had any communications with poll tax registration officers to ascertain what progress is being made in the registration process.

Mr. Lang: There have been no formal discussions. Informal contacts with registration officers indicate that the registration process is going smoothly.

Nationalised Industries

26. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people are employed by nationalised industries in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The estimate of the latest employment in nationalised industries in Scotland is about 70,000. This estimate has been compiled from figures based on somewhat different dates and methods of compilation.

Electricity Boards

28. Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board concerning the geographical divisions between the two boards following privatisation.

Mr. Lang: None.

Schools (Opting Out)

32. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with education authorities on the opting out of Scottish schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None.

36. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning the opting out of schools from local authority management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have published no proposals on this subject and have received few representations specifically concerned with it; but I am aware that a recent independent opinion poll indicated that 31 per cent. of parents supported the proposition that parents should be allowed to take their school out of education authority control if a majority wished to do so.

38. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to announce his plans for the opting out of Scottish schools; what arrangements will be made for consultation with interested parties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No decisions have been taken about the introduction of legislation on this subject.

Health Boards

33. Dr. Moonie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what rate of inflation was used when he calculated the level of resources allocated to Scottish health boards for 1988-89.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: 4·5 per cent.

Co-Star Ltd.

34. Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a further statement on the affairs of Co-Star Ltd.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The affairs of this company are still the subject of investigation by the liquidator who will report any evidence of criminality to the police or procurator fiscal.

Scottish Development Agency

35. Mr. Allen Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange to meet representatives of the Scottish Development Agency and Renfrew district council to consider future industrial development plans for the Renfrew area.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has no such plans at present. I understand, however, that the Renfrew Development Company, comprising representatives of the private sector, the Scottish Development Agency and the regional and district councils now meets on a monthly basis and discusses, among other things, the development of the local economy.

National Farmers Union

37. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met members of the Scottish National Farmers Union; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend last met members of the union at their annual dinner in Glasgow on 10 March, where a wide range of matters of mutual concern was discussed.

Overseas Development Agency (East Kilbride)

39. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to publish the report commissioned by his Department on the relocation of Civil Service posts to the Overseas Development Agency establishment in East Kilbride.

Mr. Lang: I anticipate that the report, which was commissioned by the Industry Department for Scotland, will be published in the second half of June this year. A summary article will also appear in the next issue of the Scottish Economic Bulletin which is due to be published around the end of June.

Maternity Services (Rural Areas)

40. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received about the future of maternity services provision in rural areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have received a considerable number of representations about the future of maternity services provision in Grampian. These will be fully taken into account when we come to consider the board's formal closure submissions.

Local Government

43. Mr. Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans there are to reform the structure of local government in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: I have no specific plans at present, but shall be taking views on whether and how the present structure could be improved.

Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive

44. Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent meetings he has had with the United Kingdom Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive; and what subjects were discussed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend has had no recent meetings with the executive.

Crime Prevention Panels

45. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to introduce guidelines to chief constables in the matter of appointments to crime prevention panels; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No.

Seals

46. Mr. Buchanan-Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the latest evidence available to him of the trend in the population of seals around the coast of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: The most recent advice obtained from the National Environment Research Council on grey seals estimated the population around the coast of Scotland to be approximately 87,000 in 1986 and 92,500 in 1987. Comparable figures for common seals are not available. The most recent surveys by the council estimated the minimum size of this population to be approximately 18,000 in 1986. Further surveys are planned for 1989 and 1990.

Ayrshire and Arran Health Board

49. Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of the Ayrshire and Arran health board to discuss the development of National Health Service facilities in Ayrshire.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have not met the chairman of Ayrshire and Arran health board to discuss development of National Health Service facilities in Ayrshire. On behalf of my right hon. and learned Friend I meet health board chairmen three times a year to discuss a range of matters. The last in this series of meetings was on 18 March.

COSLA

50. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend last met representatives of COSLA on Friday 29 April to discuss local government finance.

Class Actions

52. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations the Lord Advocate has received about the introduction of class actions into Scottish legal procedure; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Representations have been received recently from the Consumers' Association. My noble and learned Friend, the Lord Advocate, and my right hon. and learned Friend, the Secretary of State for Scotland, are considering steps to improve the availability in Scotland of an effective judicial remedy for a number of individuals with similar complaints against a common defender.

Labour Statistics

53. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of unemployment in Scotland; and what it was in 1979.

Mr. Lang: On 14 April 1988 (the latest date for which information is available) the number of unemployed claimants in Scotland was 309,084 (12·6 per cent.). The corresponding figure for April 1979 was 164,432 (6·7 per cent.). The figures are not directly comparable due to changes in the compilation of the statistics.

Private Medical Clinics

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of beds in private medical clinics in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In terms of the Nursing Homes Registration (Scotland) Act 1938 as amended, 5,063 beds were available in private nursing homes and hospitals as at 31 March 1987.

Ruchill Hospital, Glasgow

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has on the proposed closure of the pathology department at Ruchill hospital, Glasgow; what effect the closure will have on the treatment of AIDS; and what consultations have taken place with staff.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I understand that the Greater Glasgow health board is conducting a review of the laboratory services in its area, including the pathology units. No decision will be taken concerning the future of any of the pathology departments, including that at Ruchill, until the outcome of the review is known later this year. The board intends that there will be full consultation with the staff associations.

Patients (Transport Costs)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the costs, both in absolute and percentage terms, spent on transportation of patients to and from medical establishments in the latest year for which figures are available in (a) the Western Isles, (b) the Highlands and (c) the Borders.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The transportation of patients in Scotland is the prime responsibility of the Scottish ambulance service. In financial year 1986-87, costs incurred in the two Scottish ambulance service areas which include the Western Isles, the Highlands and the Borders were as follows:

£,000 1986-87

Scottish ambulance service	Highlands and Western Isles £	Fife, Lothian and Borders £	Scotland £
Total costs	2,048	5,861	26,994
Percentage of Scotland total	7·6	21·7	100

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the health budget accounts for travel costs in each of the following health boards (a) the Western Isles (b) the Highlands and (c) the Borders in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I assume the question relates to reimbursement of patients' travel costs. The patients' travelling expenses schemes are centrally funded and do not affect the annual allocation to each health board. Expenditure on the schemes in 1986-87 in the respective health board areas is set out in the table.

	Expenditure on patients travelling expenses schemes 1986-87 £'000s	Equivalent percentage of health board allocation for 1986-87 Percentage
Western Isles Health Board area	256	3·3
Highland Health Board area	361	0·6
Borders Health Board area	1	0·004

Chief Medical Officer

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whom outside Her Majesty's Government he is consulting about the appointment of the new chief medical officer; and when he expects to make an appointment.

Mr. Rifkind: The appointment of a chief medical officer, Scottish Home and Health Department, is being made under Civil Service Commission arrangements. A public advertisement has invited suitably qualified persons to apply for the post. The selection board interviews will be held in June with a view to appointing a successful candidate who will be expected to take up post on the retirement of the present chief medical officer.

Audit

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the British Medical Association and the Medical Practitioners Union concerning audit.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None.

Hospitals (Quality of Care)

Mr Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list since 1979 the projects with their costs approved by the Scottish Home and Health Department designed to examine quality of care in Scottish hospitals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and will arrange for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Library.

Farmers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farmers there are in each region of Scotland at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information required is shown in the table. The data is from the June agricultural census 1987.

Region	Number of farmers
Islands	2,061
Highlands	2,629
Grampian	4,431
Tayside	1,952
Fife	681
Lothian	706
Borders	1,190
Central	731
Strathclyde	4,078
Dumfries and Galloway	2,240
Scotland	20,699

Farm Workers

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farm workers are employed in each region of Scotland at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information required is shown in the table. The data is from the June agricultural census 1987:

Region	Total employed
Islands	968
Highlands	2,020
Grampian	5,603
Tayside	3,892
Fife	1,777
Lothian	1,892
Borders	2,724
Central	1,068
Strathclyde	5,724
Dumfries and Galloway	4,173

Region	Total employed
Scotland	29,841

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients are currently on waiting lists for in-patient treatment at National Health Service hospitals in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The provisional figure for 30 September 1987 is 77,772. The industrial action in 1982 led to an increase of over 29,000 in the waiting lists between March 1981 and March 1983, and the recent industrial action has resulted in nearly 3,500 operations being cancelled between January and April this year.

Prisons (Reports)

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library copies of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland's reports on Aberdeen, Inverness and Dungavel prisons.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Copies of the reports of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland on Aberdeen, Inverness and Dungavel prisons, with my response, are being placed in the Library today. I have also sent copies of the relevant reports to the Members in whose constituencies the prisons are located and to the chairman of the Scottish all-party penal affairs group, and to other interested bodies. Further copies may also be purchased from the Department.

Legal Aid

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has considered making legal aid available for multi-party actions as is now provided for, as respects England and Wales, by the Legal Aid Bill.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I consider that my regulation-making powers under the Legal Aid (Scotland) Act 1986 are sufficiently wide to allow legal aid for multi-party actions without the need for primary legislation.

New Towns

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing, for each of the five Scottish new towns for the years 1974-75 to 1989-90, inclusive, the actual or estimated (a) hectares and population within the designated area, (b) hectares and population of the host district councils, (c) numbers of employed persons within the designated area and (d) numbers of employed persons within the area of the district council.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 28 April 1988]: The information requested is as follows:

A. Hectares and population within the designated area.

Table 1 shows population for each of the towns as at 31 March each year and is based on figures supplied to the Industry Department for Scotland by the development corporations. Table 2 details the designated areas as at 31 March for 1974, 1975, 1986 and 1987; no detailed information is available for the years 1976-85 inclusive, or for 1988-90.

B. Hectares and population of the "host" district councils.

Table 1 gives the Registrar General's mid-year estimates of population for the "host" district councils. Table 2 details the area in hectares of the host district councils for the years shown; information for other years between 1974 and 1988 is not available.

[1] 1975 was the year in which the reforms embodied in the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 were implemented.

C. Numbers of employed persons within the designated area.

Up to 1981 the Census of Employment was based on the Department of Employment's Local Employment Office Areas (LEOA's). These correspond quite closely to the designated areas of the New Towns but are not precisely comparable. Irvine New Town covers 2 LEOA's, namely Irvine and Kilwinning. The 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978 and 1981 Census of Employment data is shown in Table 1; no Census was conducted in 1979, 1980, 1982 or 1983. The Livingston LEOA includes Mid Calder in 1981. The 1984 and 1987 Census of Employment data is based on travel to work areas, which do not correspond to New Town designated areas [eg East Kilbride lies within the Glasgow travel to work area]. No Census of Employment took place in 1985 or 1986 and none is planned for 1988. The results from the 1987 Census of Employment are not yet available; there are no forecasts of employment for the years 1989-90.

The New Town Development Corporations conduct regular surveys of employment within their areas. These surveys employ different definitions and methods of data collection as between Towns and the resultant figures are not necessarily consistent with official sources. These figures were collated and replicated as Appendix 2 in the National Audit Office Report no. 276, "Industry Department for Scotland: Review of Scottish new Towns", published on 22 January 1988; copies of that Report are available in the Library.

Forestry Grant-aid

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland why, pursuant to his answer of 11 May, Official Report, column 107, information concerning the payment of forestry grant-aid in Sutherland and Caithness is not kept on a readily available basis; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The information is readily available on a case-by-case basis. Since however, these records are not computerised, it would have been necessary to examine hundreds of individual files in order to provide the comprehensive information requested by the hon. Member.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's response to the proposals of the Warsaw treaty countries for a comprehensive ban on nuclear weapons testing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have not responded to the proposal of the Warsaw treaty countries, nor do we intend to do so.

Human Rights

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's commitment to human rights in their conduct of foreign policy.

Mr. Mellor: We are firmly committed to the promotion and protection of human rights and seek universal observance of the standards which have been agreed internationally for that purpose. We are concerned about violations of human rights wherever they occur and regularly raise such problems in our bilateral contacts with other Governments and in international forums such as the United Nations. Our position was set out clearly in the statement issued by Foreign Ministers of the Twelve on 21 July 1986. Copies of that statement and of the speech given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the United Nations Commission on human rights on 18 February have been placed in the Library.

Federated European State

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy with regard to progression towards a federated European state.

Mrs. Chalker: Our policy within the Community is based on commitments we entered into under the EC treaties. Nowhere do these treaties refer to progression towards a federated European state.

Chemical Disarmament

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further initiatives Her Majesty's Government have planned in the field of chemical disarmament; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Information about the exchange of visits between the United Kingdom chemical defence establishment at Porton Down and the Soviet chemical warfare facility at Shikhany was given to the House by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces on 5 May. The Soviet team is visiting Porton Down this week and as part of the programme will have talks in the FCO on 27 May about the continuing negotiations in Geneva for a comprehensive and global ban on chemical weapons. I expect to visit Geneva in July to address the conference on disarmament. A substantial part of my speech will deal with the subject of chemical weapons, particularly some of the remaining problem areas in the negotiations for a global ban.

Grenada

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Grenada concerning the plight of political prisoners and the operation of the judicial system there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No such representations have been made to the Government of Grenada. We are unaware of any political prisoners there. As an independent Commonwealth country, it is for Grenada alone to determine the judicial system it wishes to operate.

Fiji

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ensure that there is a commitment to equal rights in Fiji before continuing with any aid.

Mr. Mellor: Our policy on the allocation of bilateral aid to developing countries is based on a set of criteria published in 1987 in Cm. 225 "Bilateral Aid: Country Programmes Observations by the Government." We will continue to be guided by these criteria when considering appropriate levels of aid.

North Korea

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to recognise the Democratic People's Republic of Korea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans to recognise North Korea.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current relations with North Korea.

Mr. Mellor: We do not recognise North Korea as a state and have no diplomatic relations with any authorities there.

Syria

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with the Syrian Arab Republic.

Mr. Mellor: We broke diplomatic relations with Syria in 1986 following evidence of Syrian Government complicity in the attempt by Nizar Hindawi to plant a bomb in an El Al airliner.

We do not propose to resume relations until the Syrians abandon their support for international terrorism.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the corporation tax yield from regional selective assistance in 1987-88; and what is the estimated yield for 1988-89.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information required to provide an estimate is not available and could not be collected without disproportionate expense.

Debt Provision

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total tax relief made available to United Kingdom banks for debt provision to less developed countries in each financial year from 1973-74 in constant 1987 pound sterling.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The reductions in tax receipts as a result of losses incurred by banks on irrecoverable overseas loans are estimated to be as follows:

	£ million
1985-86	20
1986-87	30
1987-88	270

The effects on receipts for earlier years are zero or negligible.

Currency Fluctuations

Mr. Hood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, for each year since 1975, was the percentage fluctuation in the value of the national currencies of Belgium, Denmark, France, Holland, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, West Germany and Japan.

Mr. Lilley: The following table shows, for each of the eight countries in question, percentage changes in effective exchange rates, as computed by the International Monetary Fund, for the years 1975 to 1987.

Effective exchange rates: percentage changes in annual averages

Incomes

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax units will be on incomes, including unearned income, in excess of £30,000 in 1988-89.

Mr. Norman Lamont: About one million. This estimate is based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and is therefore provisional.

Child Benefit

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration has been given to the taxation of child benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 17 May.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that in 1988-89 less revenue is lost from vehicle excise duty evasion in the United Kingdom than during the 1987-88 financial year.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

In 1988-89 we shall, with the support of the police, pursue VED evadors more vigorously. A record number of enforcement campaigns is planned, covering almost half the vehicle population in England, Scotland and Wales.

Campaigns induce motorists to tax their vehicles voluntarily through local publicity and lead to the automatic prosecution of those who ignore the warnings given. During the year, the last of the vehicle registration offices will get computer terminals linked to the DVLC vehicles register.

The number of evadors brought to book through prosecutions or out of court settlements has increased every year since 1981-82 and a further increase is planned in 1988-89.

Income Tax

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated annual cost of abolishing the income limits for the various age allowances against income tax; and how many taxpayers would benefit respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 16 May 1988]: The full year cost of abolishing the aged income limit in 1988-89 would be about £190 million and about 750,000 single people and married couples would benefit. The estimates are based on a projection of the 1985-86 survey of personal incomes and are therefore provisional.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the Scottish Confederation of British Industry for a stable exchange rate; and what response he has sent.

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 23 May 1988]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received no representations from the Scottish CBI about the exchange rate this year.

WALES

Water Rates

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average annual cost of water rates in Wales; what is the environmental services component; and if he will give this information in real and cash terms for the current year and 1987.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

Welsh water authority: Average household bills

Pounds

	1987-88 (Estimated outturn)	1988-89 (Budget estimate)	1988-89 (1987-88 prices)
Average household bill	122·61	134·57	128·78
Environmental service charge component	2·15	2·32	2·22

Riverways and Freshwater Lakes

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated total length of riverways and total surface area of freshwater lakes in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The information is not available in the form requested. Estimates made for the Welsh Water Authority's "A strategic plan for water-space recreation and amenity" showed that the surface area of inland waters in Wales was 30,700 acres. The surface area of freshwater lakes in the ownership of the water authorities in Wales is some 13,400 acres. The estimated total length of "main" rivers in Wales is 3,600 miles.

Notes:

Inland waters are:

(a) rivers, streams, other watercourses, whether or not natural, artificial or tidal;

(b) lakes, ponds, reservoirs, docks;

(c) channels, creeks, bays, estuaries and arms of the sea.

Main rivers are:

A watercourse for which a water authority accepts responsibility for its land drainage functions.

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent by the Welsh water authority on (a) water quality regulation, (b) water resources, (c) water supply, (d) land drainage and flood protection, (e) recreation, amenities, fisheries and navigation, and (f) sewage collection treatment and disposal in 1987-88.

Mr. Grist: The information requested will not be available until the Welsh water authority publishes its annual accounts for 1987-88.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many staff were employed by the Welsh water authority at the latest available date.

Mr. Grist: At 31 March 1988, the Welsh water authority employed 4,618 people (full-time equivalents).

Ofwat

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals his Department is currently making with regard to the prospective powers of Ofwat; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment on Friday 20 May 1988.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the main areas of spending in Welsh regional health authorities.

Mr. Grist: There are no regional health authorities in Wales. However, the main areas of health authorities' spending in Wales in 1986-87, the latest financial year for which information is available, were as follows:

	£ thousands
Hospital services	542,762
Community health service	67,270
Other services[1]	33,737
Headquarters administration	26,931
Total revenue expenditure	670,700
Capital expenditure	60,716
Total expenditure	731,416

Source: Health Authorities Annual Accounts.

[1] Includes ambulance services, blood transfusion services, emergency bed services, contractual hospitals and, homes, community health councils and other expenditure.

Handicapped Pupils

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the number of local education authority areas in which there is a physiotherapy service available in schools, including special schools, to answer the needs of handicapped pupils.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are being taken to ensure that all the technical, polytechnical and further education colleges in Wales are fully accessible for students in wheelchairs.

Mr. Grist: It is the responsibility of education authorities and others providing educational buildings to make provision for disabled students. For new buildings, education authorities must observe the minimum requirements of the Department of Education and Science design note No. 18 (1984) "Access for disabled people to Educational Buildings" which cover the question of wheelchair access.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many handicapped pupils were registered in January 1987 with local education authorities in Wales as having a need for special education and have that need satisfied at special schools outside Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In January 1987 local authorities in Wales recorded 13,163 pupils for whom they were or will be maintaining a statement of special educational needs. Information is not available on the number of statemented pupils receiving special education at special schools outside Wales, but in January 1987 a total of 458 statemented pupils were receiving special education in a Welsh or English local authority other than their own.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department has spent or provided in the last financial year on improving access to educational buildings in Wales for disabled students.

Mr. Grist: Improved access for disabled students is incorporated into the design of new and improved educational buildings. The costs of such provision are not normally separately distinguished.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the circulars which have been issued by his Department over the past 20 years to local education authorities in Wales dealing with the teaching of the Welsh language or the provision of education through the medium of the Welsh language.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Date of Issue	Reference	Title
29 November 1977	WO 185/77	Local education authority arrangements for the school curriculum 1
12 December 1978	WO 153/78	Co-ordination of services for children under five

24 June 1987	WO 34/87	Education Act 1980: Section 21 Grants for Welsh language education 1988-89

Notes

1. Responses to Section G (Welsh language) of this circular are summarised in "Local Authority arrangements for the school curriculum" (Welsh Office, 1979)
2. Responses to this circular are summarised in "Local Authority reviews of the school curriculum in Wales" (Welsh Office, June 1986).

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in how many secondary schools in Wales it is now possible for pupils to undertake most or all of their education through the medium of the Welsh language; and how many pupils currently receive all or a large part of their secondary education through the medium of the Welsh language.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The latest available information for maintained secondary schools relates to September 1987 and is given in the table:

Number of subjects taught through the medium of Welsh	Number of schools	Number of pupils on roll
16 or more subjects	25	17,634
11 to 15 subjects	13	7,628
6 to 10 subjects	2	1,563
1 to 5 subjects	13	10,043

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present employment level in Welsh Development Agency factories; and what were the comparable figures for 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information in the form requested is not available. I have asked the Welsh Development Agency to undertake the necessary analysis and when this is complete I will write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people have been employed by the Welsh Development Agency in each year from 1979 to 1987;

(2) what was the last budget of the Welsh Development Agency in each year since 1979; what was the increase in real terms in the budget from 1979 to 1981-82, 1982-83, 1983-84, 1984-85, 1985-86 and 1986-87; and what was the increase in staff from 1979 to the present time.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information is as follows:

Gross mainstream latest budgets (£ million)

	Cash	1988-89 prices[1]	Increase on 1979-80	Average number of staff in post
1979-80	34·5	63·2	—	472

[3] Initial Budget.

In addition to the mainstream budgets shown above the Agency was provided with special resources to help mitigate the effects of the steel closures in the late 1970s and early 1980s. The resources involved are as follows:

£ million

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84
Cash	27·5	22·3	33·2	13·8	5·6
1988-89 prices [1]	50·4	34·5	46·7	18·1	7·0

Teachers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full-time peripatetic teachers were working for each local authority in Wales in January; how many were shared with other authorities; and how many were part-time peripatetic technical teachers.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in respect of peripatetic teachers is not yet available for January 1988. However the numbers in January 1987 are given in the table. Information is not available on the number of peripatetic teachers shared between authorities, or on the number of part-time peripatetic technical teachers employed.

Number of peripatetic teachers employed by local authorities[1] at January 1987

	Full-time	Part-time
Clwyd	57	64
Dyfed	113	7
Gwent	29	–
Gwynedd	56	38
Mid Glamorgan	270	79
Powys	46	5
South Glamorgan	50	27
West Glamorgan	60	21

[1] Teachers released or seconded for service in schools outside each authority's area should be included in the count of the authorities maintaining the schools to which the teachers are released and excluded from the count for the releasing authority. Teachers shared equally between authorities may be double-counted.

Mentally Handicapped Children

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines he has issued to local education authorities in Wales to ensure that educational facilities for mentally handicapped children give due regard to the home language of such children.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The policy statement "Welsh in Schools" issued in July 1981 gave advice to local education authorities in respect of all pupils, including those with special educational needs, on the place of Welsh in the school curriculum. Welsh Office circulars 59/81 and 5/83 make the point that linguistic factors are not to be construed as a learning difficulty within the definition of the Education Act 1981, but that, in assessing a child's special educational needs, care should be taken to use a language with which the child and his parents are familiar.

Welsh Development Agency

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the Welsh Development Agency budget was spent in each Welsh district during the last 12 months.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information in the form requested is not available.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the total expenditure of the Welsh Development Agency since its inception.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Welsh Development Agency's gross expenditure to the end of 1987-88 amounts to £791 million, inclusive of the special resources allocated to mitigate the effects of the steel closures in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

School Leavers

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many persons left school at the end of the last summer term; and, of these, how many are (a) in full-time permanent employment, (b) in full-time education, (c) in youth training or temporary employment schemes and (d) unemployed; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: Information on the number of persons who left school at the end of the last summer term is not yet available. Detailed information on the first destination of school leavers is not available in the form required. Information on those who left school, by term, for each year since 1979 and their intended destination is available in the table:

Term of Leaving[1]	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Stretford of Wednesday 20 April, Official Report, columns 472-73, if he will give for each standard region, from March to March, for each of the last 10 years (a) the total number of employees in employment, and the annual change in employees in employment expressed numerically and as a percentage of the available work force, (b) the number of people in receipt of unemployment benefit, together with the percentage annual change, (c) the average number of hours worked per employee, (d) the total number of hours worked and (e) the annual change in hours worked, in numerical and percentage terms.

The working population is the sum of employees in employment, the self-employed, members of HM forces and the unemployed.

The table shows seasonally adjusted adult unemployment together with the percentage annual change for each of the standard regions for each March from 1979 to 1988.

Mines and Quarries Act 1954

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will specify the associated legislation which is to be replaced along with the Mines and Quarries Act 1954.

Mr. Nicholls: In addition to the Mines and Quarries Act 1954 the new legislation will replace the Mines Management Act 1971, approximately 50 sets of national regulations and many local regulations made under the 1954 Act. A small number of regulations made under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, before the start of the legislative renewal programme, will also be replaced.

Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were the national weekly average gross earnings and gross hours of work, excluding underemployment hours, for registered dock workers in all dock labour scheme ports for the calendar year 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: The national weekly average gross earnings for registered dock workers in all dock labour scheme ports in the calendar year 1987, excluding underemployment hours, was £298·56; and the national weekly average gross hours of work, excluding underemployment hours, for registered dock workers in all dock labour scheme ports for the calendar year 1987 was 41.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Electro-convulsive Therapy

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each of the last three years for which figures are available (a) the total number of patients detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983, (b) the number of such patients treated with electro-convulsive therapy and (c) the number of such cases where emergency powers were used to permit treatment with electro-convulsive therapy.

Mrs. Currie: The total number of admissions of patients detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983 is as follows:

Mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units, and Special Hospitals, England

	1984	1985	1986
Number of admissions under s.2 Mental Health Act 1983	6,855	7,758	8,260

Figures relate to admissions and not individual patients since an individual may be admitted more than once during the year.

Details relating to the number of patients detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983 who are treated with electro-convulsive therapy, and the number of such cases where emergency powers were used to permit treatment with electro-convulsive therapy, are not collected centrally.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what regulations are currently in force regarding the treatment of patients detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mrs. Currie: Regulations governing the use of treatment for mental disorder for all patients detained under the powers of the Mental Health Act 1983 are contained in part IV of the Act and also in Statutory Instrument 1983, No. 893 (The Mental Health (Hospital, Guardianship and Consent to Treatment) Regulations 1983).

Agency Staff

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on agency staff in the National Health Service in the latest period for which figures are available.

Mr. Newton: Following is information derived from annual accounts submitted to the Department for 1986-87 (the latest year available):

Expenditure on Non-national Health Service (Agency, etc) Staff

	£000
Regional and district health authorities and the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals	150,092
Family practitioner committees	296
England total	150,388

Note:
The figures exclude expenditure by special health authorities and other bodies providing central services to the National Health Service. Their annual accounts do not separately identify such expenditure but, given the level of their total expenditure, that on agency staff is not thought to be significant.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the expenditure in each regional health authority on agency staff employed on administrative, secretarial and clerical work in each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Newton: The table shows the information that is available for total expenditure incurred on agency staff employed on administrative, secretarial and clerical work by each health region in England from 1978-79 to 1986-87 (the latest year available):

Expenditure on non-National Health Service (agency, etc.)—Administrative and Clerical staff

Annual accounts of regional and district health authorities and those of the special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals. (Predecessor authorities for the years prior to 1982-83).
Note:
The total expenditure figures for 1985-86 and 1986-87 exclude expenditure incurred by family practitioner committees (£146,000 and £240,000, respectively). Prior to 1 April 1985 family practitioner committees (FPCs) were associated with district (formerly area) health authorities and their relevant expenditure was included in the annual accounts of those health authorities and is not separately identifiable.

Flood Damage

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make additional resources available in the Ealing district under the social fund to enable payments to be made in respect of recent severe flood damage to people's furniture and fittings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: Additional allocations from the contingency reserve will be considered following an unforeseen and unforeseeable demand which could not be met from a local office's budget. There is no indication that circumstances in Ealing warrant an additional allocation.

Private Medical Clinics

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the total number of beds in private medical clinics in England.

Mrs. Currie: On 31 December 1986, the latest date for which information is available centrally, there were 62,112 beds in private hospitals, homes and clinics registered under section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984. Details from Form SBH 212 are published annually and are available in the Library.

Benefit Claims (Lambeth)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications for single payments, additional requirement claims and supplementary benefit claims, made before 11 April are outstanding at his Department's offices serving the London borough of Lambeth.

Mr. Portillo: Information on outstanding additional requirement claims is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The number of outstanding single payments and supplementary benefit claims in each of the 10 local offices serving the London borough of Lambeth is given in the table. The boundaries of these offices are not conterminous with those of the borough.

Mr. J. Wall (Application)

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services why no decision has yet been made on an application to his Department's offices at 6 Camberwell new road, London SE5, by Mr. Julian Wall, of 13 Carlton mansions, Coldharbour lane, London SW9, which was made to that office in October 1987.

Mr. Portillo: I will write to the hon. Member.

Leicester Royal Infirmary

Sir John Farr: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take immediate steps to remedy the shortage of skilled staff which has brought about the closure of the recently opened bone marrow transplant unit at the Leicester Royal infirmary.

Mrs. Currie: Responsibility for the management of local health services lies with the district health authority concerned. However, I understand that the bone marrow unit referred to which closed because of staff shortages on 16 May will reopen on 30 May. Nationally the recent pay awards and the clinical grading review should help to overcome difficulties associated with recruitment of specialised nursing staff. We are also encouraging district health authorities to broaden their recruitment methods. My hon. Friend may wish to contact the chairman of Leicestershire district health authority for more detailed information.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the enterprise allowance is not regarded as income in the determination of housing benefit.

Mr. Portillo: No. An enterprise allowance is a business receipt which counts as gross income of that business. The determination of a claim for housing benefit is made by reference to net business profit and any other income or capital held by the claimant. In some cases, maximum housing benefit would be payable even where an enterprise allowance was in payment.

Pensions

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the cost of giving all pensioners aged over 80 years an extra £2 a week.

Mr. Scott: The estimated annual cost of increasing retirement pensions for those over 80 by £2 a week would be about £200 million if the rates of income support and housing benefit were increased by corresponding amounts.

Age Allowance

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services for how long the 25p age addition has been paid to pensioners; and what is its value in real terms now in relation to its inaugural value.

Mr. Scott: At 1971 prices, the 25p age addition is currently worth 5p.

Women's Pensions

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to what percentage of pension schemes allow women to pass on their rights to their husbands.

Mr. Scott: The Department does not collect information centrally or keep records of occupational pension schemes provisions. However, schemes which contract-out of the state earnings related pension scheme are required to make provision for both widows' and widowers' benefits.

Women's Refuges

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of places per 10,000 women at women's refuges for each year since 1979.

Mrs. Currie: Information in this form is not available for each year since 1979. Currently, however, the national voluntary organisation, Women's Aid Federation (England), estimates that there are 1,282 places at women's refuges in England and Wales. This represents 0·64 of a place for every 10,000 women aged 18 and over, or one place per 15,600 women.

Social Security Expenditure

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the financial saving to the Exchequer of removing the link between the average earnings index in November 1980 and social security benefits, with figures to be shown for each individual benefit effect for each financial year up to and including 1988-89.

Mr. Scott: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Cash Limits

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any changes will be made to cash limits for his Department in 1988-89.

Mr. Newton: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class XIV, vote 1, (Hospital and community health and other services, England) will be increased by £538,303,000 (from £10,653,687,000 to £11,191,990,000). This increase follows the decision to implement, from 1 April 1988, the recommendations of the review bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 21 April 1988.

The cash limit for class XIV, vote 3 (Miscellaneous health services and personal social services, England) will be increased by £400,000 (from £417,746,000 to £418,146,000), reflecting the transfer, from the non-cash limited class XIV, vote 2, of provision to meet the cost of location incentives to dentists.

The public expenditure costs of these changes have been charged to the Reserve and do not add to the public expenditure planning total.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which of the Korner recommendations suggested the abolition of the distinction between urgent and non-urgent cases;

(2) which professional organisations were consulted about the abolition of the distinction between urgent and non-urgent cases; and if any representations have been received from them;

(3) what change he will now make to principle 14·3 contained in his booklet "Management of Private Practice in Health Service Hospitals in England and Wales" after the abolition of the distincion between urgent and non-urgent cases.

Mr. Newton [holding answer 5 May 1988]: In paragraph 11.20 of its first report to the Secretary of State, the Korner steering group listed the minimum data which it recommended should be collected on the demand for hospital treatment. The steering group purposely did not include a distinction between urgent and non-urgent cases. Paragraph 11.21 makes clear that the recording of such a distinction should be left to local choice.

Comments on the report were received from the Joint Consultants Committee, the General Medical Services Committee, the Royal College of Nursing and the Royal College of Radiologists. None of these commented specifically on the recommendations in paragraphs 11.20 and 11.21.

The discontinuation of the distinction between urgent and non-urgent cases in central statistical returns does not affect the operation of common waiting lists for private and national health service patients which will continue to be based on clinical priority.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what specific steps are being taken to reduce waiting lists for orthopaedic surgery in Dartford and Gravesham district health authority.

Mr. Newton [holding answer 5 May 1988]: There is a variety of local developments going on in orthopaedics in Dartford and Gravesham. If my hon. Friend cares to write to the chairman of the health authority, I am sure he will be pleased to provide the information required.

Social Security Reform

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the cost of retraining staff to enable them to administer the new social security system following the implementation of the Social Security Act 1986.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 16 May 1988]: £21 million.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Movements (Cumbria)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why he refused to designate the area of Cumbria immediately adjacent to the Solway Firth from Maryport eastwards as a restricted area for sheep movement on 20 June 1986.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The determination of the boundaries of the restricted area was based on all information available at the time. This included sheep, milk and crop monitoring results and an extensive deposition survey carried out by the Institute of Terrestrial Ecology.

Livestock (Genetic Improvement)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next intends meeting representatives of animal welfare groups to discuss the genetic improvement of livestock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have no plans at present for such a meeting, but I and my officials meet the animal welfare societies from time to time to discuss matters of current interest.

Food Act 1984

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in the review of the Food Act 1984; and when he expects consultations to be concluded.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Following my announcement in October last year officials have held informal discussions with organisations affected by our proposals to review the food Acts on the outstanding issues that need to be decided in the detail of the revisions.

The consultations are continuing but are expected to be completed by late summer.

Milk

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much milk is currently being produced in herds subject to BST testing.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The animal test certificates under which the trials are authorised permit the treatment of a maximum of 1,130 cows. However, the number of cows treated at any one time is likely to be less than this. Information on the volume of milk produced in herds involved in the trial is not available.

Council of Ministers

Mr. John Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement concerning the outcome of the last meeting of the European Community Agriculture Council.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Summerson) on 18 May at columns 473-74.

Animal Disease Research

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the recommendations contained in the Wildy report on the future of animal disease research in Britain with particular reference to proposals for decentralisation and a new animal disease co-ordinating board.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The Wildy report to Agriculture Ministers and the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council on research and development in farm animal diseases was published on 4 March 1988. The report's recommendations, including those for the establishment of an animal disease co-ordinating board and on the restructuring of establishments, are under consideration and no conclusions have yet been reached.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Inward Investment

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of new inward investment into Northern Ireland in the last year.

Mr. Viggers: During the year 1987-88 12 new projects which are expected to create 867 jobs were finalised. This represents a considerable improvement upon the results for 1986-87. The aggregate investment associated with the 12 new projects is £21·5 million against which IDB has offered selective financial assistance totalling £6·2 million.

Social Security

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what resources his Department is devoting to monitoring the effects of the recent social security changes on the Province.

Mr. Needham: The effects of the social security reforms are being monitored in the main using the wide range of data derived from the Department's management, expenditure and statistical returns. This involves a substantial staff effort, but it is not possible to provide a reliable estimate of the cost.

Member's Questions

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the written answer of 19 May, Official Report, column 565, to the hon. Member for Brent, East, what are the reasons for the delay in providing substantive replies to the remaining questions put down for answer on 26 and 28 April.

Mr. Stanley: Replies to the hon. Member's remaining questions have now been given.

Fair Employment

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to publish his White Paper on fair employment in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tom King: A White Paper entitled "Fair Employment in Northern Ireland" was published today. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and are also available in the Vote Office.

I outlined the main features of our proposals for new fair employment legislation in my written answer of 2 March to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), and they were published in the form of a brochure, copies of which were placed in the Library. Today's White Paper explains the policy more fully and sets out in some detail the key elements of the proposed legislation. The Government intend to introduce a Bill into Parliament at the earliest opportunity.

The Government's proposals for new legislation are designed to strengthen existing fair employment law in Northern Ireland. They clearly demonstrate our continuing commitment to eradicate job discrimination and to promote genuine equality of opportunity in employment. the proposed measures will improve the institutional structure within which the policy will operate and will lead to better equal opportunity practice in both the public and private sectors.

These proposals represent an effective and constructive response from the Government to a serious economic and social problem in Northern Ireland. Despite the progress which has been made, and the sound work of the Fair Employment Agency since 1976, it is clear that a broader approach to the problems of disadvantage and discrimination is necessary, and that this must also deal with the problems of indirect and unintentional discrimination. The elimination of all discrimination in the workplace is one of the Government's major priorities.

The proposals set out in the White Paper are far reaching. They impose important new responsibilities on employers, and entail serious penalties for breach of duty. But the emphasis throughout our proposals is on fairness. We do not want to transfer hardship from one section of the community to another. we do not wish to impose an intolerable administrative burden on employers. We intend to give support to anyone who is genuinely trying to create employment and prosperity in Northern Ireland. The problems which the Government are addressing in this White Paper are of long standing and will require time and determination to resolve. The proposals published today represent a major step in the right direction.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will name each employer for which the Fair Employment Agency has completed or initiated formal investigations under section 12 and section 24 of the Fair Employment Act (NI) 1976, stating the nature of the finding in each case;

(2) how many complaints under section 24 of the Fair Employment Act (NI) 1976 have been made against (a) public bodies and (b) private employers; and what has been the outcome in each case.

Mr. Viggers: It is not the practice to release the names of employers who are the subject of an investigation by the Fair Employment Agency under section 12 of the 1976 Act, unless it is considered appropriate on completion of an investigation, nor to identify the parties in a formal investigation under section 24 of the Act. Agency reports on section 12 investigations, where published, are available in the Library as are copies of agency's annual reports which contain an account of investigations under section 24 of the Act. A breakdown of agency investigations under each section, together with the names of employers published by the agency, is given in the tables.

Bombs (Detonation)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum distance between bomb and person detonating it over which a remote-controlled bomb has been known to have detonated in Northern Ireland in the following circumstances: (a) in open countryside, (b) in an urban area and (c) where there was a high concrete obstruction between the bomb and the person detonating it.

Mr. Ian Stewart [holding answer 23 May 1988]: I have been asked to reply.

The circumstances in which a bomb can be remotely detonated by means of a command wire or by radio control are extremely variable. It is not possible to provide the information requested.

Firearms and Explosives

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions from 1972 to the current date members of the security forces supplied (a) firearms, (b) ammunition and (c) explosives to civilians in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: I am aware of only one such incident. This came to light following an RUC investigation into the murder of Mr. William Strathearn in April 1977. It was established that two serving police officers had taken part in the murder and that the murder weapon had been provided by one of them. In June 1980 both men were found guilty of murder and firearms offences and were sentenced to life imprisonment. If the hon. Member has evidence of possible further offences he will no doubt bring them to the attention of the police.

Security Forces (Attacks)

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on how many occasions from 1972 to the current date, members of the security forces have asked civilians (a) to fire on and (b) to attack other members of the security forces or their property.

Mr. Stanley [holding answer 26 April 1988]: I am not aware of any such occasions. If the hon. Member has evidence of possible offences he will no doubt bring them to the attention of the police.

Ministerial Duties

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Friends of the Earth the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have had no official meetings with the Friends of the Earth during the past year although I have met individual members of that organisation from time to time.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many meetings concerning historic buildings the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them;

(2) how many meetings concerning ancient monuments the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I attended meetings concerning historic buildings and ancient monuments on 22 June 1987, 28 June 1987, 30 July 1987, 24 September 1987, 28 September 1987, 20 January 1988, 27 January 1988, 9 February 1988 and 24 February 1988.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings concerning royal parks the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I attended meetings on 30 July 1987 and 3 November 1987 and I visited the royal parks on 30 October 1987.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with trade unions involved in the water industry the Minister of Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: Since taking office I have had no meetings with the trades unions involved in the water industry.

On 18 April officials of the Department met representatives of NALGO to discuss the proposed establishment of the National Rivers Authority and the privatisation of the water authorities' utility functions. The water authorities will themselves consult the trades unions on the schemes of reorganisation which they have been asked to prepare.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with regional water authorities the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: Since taking office I have met representatives of the regional water authorities on 16 occasions as listed:

Authority	Number of meetings
Anglian	2
Northumbrian	2
North West	1
Severn-Trent	1
Southern	2
South West	1
Thames	3
Wessex	1
Yorkshire	3

I have visited all the water authorities in England.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Countryside Commission the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: Two. I met the chairman of the Countryside Commission, Sir Derek Barber, on 27 January when we discussed, among other things, appointments to the national park authorities. On 8 October 1987 I attended the international symposium on protected landscapes in Grange-over-Sands which was organised by the commission.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Nature Conservancy Council the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have not needed to attend any meetings with the Nature Conservancy Council (NCC) since my appointment last year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and other ministerial colleagues who are more closely involved in the council's affairs have met members of the NCC on several occasions during the last year.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings concerning the Ordnance Survey the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have attended meetings concerning Ordnance Survey on 11 occasions since June 1987.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the British Waterways Board the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I met the British Waterways Board (BWB) chairman on 19 November 1987, and on 15 January, 5 February, 21 March and 19 May this year. In addition, I visited the BWB Birmingham area on 11 March and opened the Milton Keynes marina on 30 April.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the League Against Cruel Sports the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: None.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Ramblers Association the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: None. But representatives of the Ramblers Association met my right hon. Friend, Lord Belstead, when he was Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water, on 27 October 1987 and I have had informal discussions in the course of my official duties.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Long Distance Walkers Association the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: None.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Water Authorities Association the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: Since taking office I have met the Water Authorities Association on four occasions.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with English Heritage the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I attended a meeting with English Heritage on 15 July 1987.

Surrey Docks

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current sale price of land in the Surrey docks area of the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Trippier: Between £1 million and £4 million per acre for housing and commercial development.

Schools (Newham)

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what land the London Docklands development corporation is making available for new schools in the Newham area of the London Docklands development corporation.

Mr. Trippier: Sites for three primary schools. The corporation is discussing with the local education authority how it might further assist in the royal docks area.

Docklands

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give a breakdown of the 36,000 new jobs referred to on 12 May, Official Report, column 466, in Docklands; if they are new; how many are relocations; and if the figures are net.

Mr. Trippier: The figure of 36,000 is for the total number of jobs now in docklands. Analysis of the net changes is being undertaken by the corporation. I will write to the hon. Member when details are available.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a summarised housing revenue account, consistent with table 9.1 of Cm. 288-II, for each of the years 1982-83 to 1990-91 for (i) English local authorities, (ii) new town development corporations in England and (iii) Housing Corporation-financed housing in England.

Mrs. Roe: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as the information has been collected.

Construction Products Directive

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has concerning the progress of the draft construction products directive; when it will be finalised; and when it is expected to become operative;

(2) if he will consider the desirability of rationalising the three sets of building regulations in operation in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The draft construction products directive is being considered by the Internal Market Council working party on economic questions, and is to be referred to the Permanent Representatives Committee (COREPER) very shortly. A number of issues are outstanding, but it may be possible to reach agreement in the Council of Ministers before the end of the German presidency. It is intended that the directive should come into effect 12 months after adoption by the Council.

One of the objectives of the current review of the building regulations is to bring the technical requirements in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland closer together. My officials are working closely with officials in Scotland and Northern Ireland on the principle that technical requirements ought to be the same, unless differences can be specifically justified.

Water Regulations

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce water regulations throughout the United Kingdom; what is the time scale for introducing such regulations; and how such regulations will be enforced.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 23 May 1988]: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State for Wales intend to table a number of regulations before the summer recess to do with water metering under sections of the Public Utility Transfers and Water Charges Act 1988. These regulations will apply only in England and Wales and will come into force this year.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated number of schemes which will now have to be vetted by his Department as a result of the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 May 1988]: The regulations referred to in the question do not in themselves require any schemes to be submitted to my right hon. Friend for approval. It is too soon to say how many applications for additional capital allocations will be submitted as a result of the concessions announced by my right hon. Friend on 25 April at columns 103-104. The great majority of those so far received do not relate to schemes affected by the regulations.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if short-term leases of private properties taken by local authorities in order to provide temporary homes for the homeless will be exempt from the Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 19 May 1988]: The Local Government (Prescribed Expenditure) (Amendment) Regulations 1988 provide, inter alia, that, with certain exceptions, expenditure by a local authority on the acquisition of a leasehold interest in land, including buildings, for a term not exceeding three years is not prescribed expenditure and thus is not subject to the limits on capital expenditure laid down in part VIII of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

Rating Reform

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of pensioner households and pensioner tax units, both single persons and married couples, who would be eligible for a community charge rebate under a taper of (a) 20 per cent. and (b) 15 per cent. in calculating rebate entitlement.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The information requested is as set out. The estimates assume that the community charge is fully in place.

England, thousands

	20 per cent. taper	15 per cent. taper
1. Pensioner households	2,260	2,400
2. Pensioner tax units	2,920	3,080

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will recalculate the number of pensioner households and pensioner tax units, both single persons and married couples, who (a) gain and (b) lose under the community charge on the basis of a taper of 15 per cent. for calculating entitlement to rebate.

Mr. Howard [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The information requested is as set out:

England, thousands

		Number
1. Pensioner households	Gaining	3,120
	Losing	1,150
2. Pensioner tax units	Gaining	3,470
	Losing	1,960

PRIME MINISTER

Canary Wharf

Q20. Ms. Gordon: To ask the Prime Minister why the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar was not informed (a) by her Office of her visit to Bow and Poplar on 11 May and (b) by the Department of Trade and Industry of Lord Young's visit on 4 November 1987, in connection with the Canary Wharf development; and if she will ensure that in future Ministers visiting Canary Wharf inform the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar in advance.

The Prime Minister: As my Office explained to the hon. Lady on 11 May, I regret that she was not informed in advance of my visit. My usual practice in such matters is set out in my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 11 May 1988 at column 121. I have drawn the hon. Lady's concern to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Rogerstone, Newport

Q98. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister, if she has any plans to visit Rogerstone, Newport, Gwent.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Community Care

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Prime Minister if she will consider the appointment of a Minister for community care, in the light of the recommendations in the recent report by Sir Roy Griffiths.

The Prime Minister: We are considering carefully all Sir Roy Griffiths' recommendations for community care, and shall bring forward proposals in due course.

Sheepmeat Regime

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Prime Minister whether she will appoint the Secretary of State for Wales to represent the United Kingdom in the European Community Council of Agriculture Ministers' discussions on the sheepmeat regime; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend works in close collaboration with the Minister of Agriculture on all matters of importance to agriculture, including the sheepmeat regime.

Engagements

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 26 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

ENERGY

Energy Prices

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many representations he has received from manufacturing industries in the last 12 months regarding (a) electricity price increases, and (b) gas prices; what industrial categories such representations have been received from; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Parkinson: I have received a large number of representations about industrial electricity prices, covering most sectors of manufacturing industry: such prices are primarily a matter for the electricity supply industry to decide within the financial framework agreed with Government. Industrial gas prices are a matter for British Gas plc and the Office of Fair Trading.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish in the Official Report a table, covering the period 1979-80 to 1988-89, showing the aggregate external financing limit for the electricity supply industry in England and Wales; the ex ante composition of this aggregate between the Central Electricity Generating Board, individiual area boards and the Electricity Council itself; and a comparable ex post composition.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The aggregate external financing limit (EFL) for the electricity supply industry in England and Wales is published in the annual public expenditure White Paper. The table shows (i) the initial forecast of the EFL taking no account of agreed revisions during the year and (ii) the outturn. The EFL is set for the industry as a whole; and the required contribution by individual boards is a matter for the industry. The actual contributions by boards are stated in their annual reports and accounts.

Financial year	Initial EFL forecast £ million	Outturn EFL £ million

Ceramic Industry

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received from (a) firms in the ceramic industry and (b) firms from north Staffordshire with regard to the privatisation of electricity; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have received representations on privatisation from many sectors of industry, and from many parts of the country.

Energy Consumption

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how much energy was consumed in the United Kingdom for non-transport purposes during 1987; and what is his assessment of the effect the energy efficiency office had on this figure.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Provisional figures for 1987 suggest that 41,636 million therms of energy were consumed for non-transport purposes. It is estimated that the activities of the Energy Efficiency Office contributed to the reduction of some 4 per cent. in (non-transport) energy consumption per unit of GDP compared to the previous year.

British Coal

Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what deficit grant to British Coal was accrued in the corporation's accounts in each financial year since 1979; when it was paid; and what further deficit grant the Government intend to pay.

Mr. Parkinson: Deficit grant to the British Coal Corporation was accrued and paid as shown in the table.

The Coal Industry Act 1987 provided that up to £200 million might be paid in respect of deficits arising in 1987-88 and 1988-89. The full £200 million was paid in 1987-88 to defray that year's deficit. The Government have no plans to seek to increase or extend the statutory powers to pay deficit grant.

Mr. Kenneth Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what financial support the Government expect to give British Coal in 1988-89.

Mr. Parkinson: British Coal's external financing limit for 1988-89 has been set at £670 million. As announced to the House on 28 March, at column 295, planned financing was made up as follows:

	£ million
Restructuring Grant	116·0
Other non-deficit grants	273·5
Net Borrowing	280·5

The requirement for restructuring grant in 1988-89 is being reviewed following the substantially increased number of redundancies in the closing days of 1987-88, which has resulted in higher than expected expenditure on redundancy lump sums early in 1988-89. A summer Supplementary Estimate will be submitted to seek approval for the additional grant. I am also considering the implications for the corporation's external finance limit. I will make an announcement to the House in due course.

The Government have agreed that, subject to Parliament's approving any necessary provisions, adequate funds will continue to be made available to enable the corporation to meet its financial obligations as they fall due during the corporation's financial year ending 25 March 1989. The Government have also renewed their guarantee in respect of limited overdraft facilities at United Kingdom clearing banks for 1988-89.

The House was told on 8 March that the loss for 1987-88 (after net restructuring charges) was likely to be higher than originally expected. Following the extra redundancies late in the year referred to above; the loss will be still greater.

As the House was told on 2 March, at column 1075, British Coal has for some months been precluded from access to longer-term funds from the national loans fund (NLF). The corporation's current financial position and uncertain business prospects make it inappropriate for the NLF to continue to make new loans of any duration to it. It is therefore proposed, subject to approval of the necessary Supply Estimate, to refinance from loans on vote under section 2 of the Coal Industry Act 1980, the whole of the short-term and overnight NLF debt expected to be outstanding at the time of approval of the Estimate, together with longer-term debt maturing in, and net new borrowing requirement for, the remainder of 1988-89. A Supplementary Estimate for a sum expected to be of the order of £1·8 billion will accordingly be submitted in due course. Of this, only the projected £280·5 million mentioned above represents net new borrowing in 1988-89; the remainder is to refinance existing NFL debt. The £280·5 million is already within the current EFL, and therefore the new arrangements do not represent an increase in public expenditure.

The Coal Industry Act 1980 provides that the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Treasury, may issue directions as to the rates of interest payable on loans on vote; and that the interest may be deferred. It is intended that the rate of interest, at least initially, shall be at the same rate, and paid at the same time, as would be due on equivalent NLF loans. This will be kept under review in the light of British Coal's developing financial position. I would inform the House of any decision to soften the terms of future loans or defer the payment of interest.

The corporation remains committed to the objective of achieving breakeven for 1988-89 after full interest charges and net restructuring costs; achieving an increasing surplus on revenue account in following years; and contributing increasingly to self-financing. These represent challenging targets, but are attainable provided the industry continues its drive towards greater flexibility and competitiveness and avoids damaging industrial action.

Radioactive Waste (Disposal)

Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the disposal of the radioactive wastes prepared for sea disposal in 1983.

Mr. Parkinson: The Government have decided not to resume sea dumping of drummed radioactive wastes. Instead, these will be prepared for eventual disposal in the deep facility for low and intermediate-level wastes which Nirex has been asked to develop.

The Government nevertheless remain in no doubt that sea disposal makes good sense for some categories of waste, and intend to keep open this option for large items arising from decommissioning operations.

Cash Limits

Mr. Andy Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether any changes will be made to his Department's cash limits for 1988-89.

Mr. Parkinson: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit for class VI, vote 7, will be increased by £3,500,000 to £6 million. This increase reflects a revision of the amount of work to be undertaken in 1988-89 in connection with the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales now that a number of decisions have been taken and published in the White Paper "Privatising Electricity" (Cm 322).

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Multinational Companies (Third World)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals his Department has to increase the role of multinational companies in fostering economic development in the Third world.

Mr. Chris Patten: The bilateral and multilateral aid programmes provide substantial opportunities for British-based multinational companies to assist with approved projects in the Third world. Now that the aid programme is growing in real terms the scope for such assistance will increase. Through our support for structural adjustment we are also seeking to promote a better policy environment within developing countries, and one that is more conducive to direct foreign investment. The Commonwealth Development Corporation often invests in projects overseas in partnership with British private investors.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has now considered the views expressed by the local authority employers and the teacher unions on his proposals following the report of the interim advisory committee on school teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: After careful consideration of the representations I have received, following the publication of the report from the interim advisory committee on school teachers' pay and conditions, I have decided to accept the committee's recommendations on pay rates. Drafts of amendments to the "School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Document 1987," an order which will give effect to the 1988 document, and a circular to local education authorities, are being sent today to the relevant local authority associations, teacher unions and bodies representing the interests of the governors of voluntary schools inviting any comments by Wednesday 8 June.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has reviewed the range of employment practices over the last few years in the light of Civil Service policy on equal opportunities. This has led to such developments as the introduction of "keeping in touch" arrangements for those who resign for domestic reasons, and the provision of women-only development training courses. Guidance on equal opportunity policies is included in the training provided for those involved in staff appraisal, recruitment and promotion interviewing. Ethnic monitoring is being used in sample recruitment surveys to measure the number of white and ethnic minority applicants and to identify significant variations in their success rates throughout the competition.

Free School Milk and Meals

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many schoolchildren in the county of Leicestershire received discretionary free milk in 1987; how many such children now receive discretionary free milk; and how many and what percentage of such children were or are, respectively, in schools for children with special needs;

(2) how many children in the county of Leicestershire received discretionary free milk at school under supplementary benefit or family income supplement rules but are no longer receiving the same under the new income support rules;

(3) how many schoolchildren in Leicestershire in 1987 received free school meals and milk; how many now receive the same; and what percentage have lost such entitlement;

(4) how many special schools in the city of Leicester have been affected by the removal of discretionary free school milk; which schools are so affected; and how many and what percentage of children attending each of those schools have lost that entitlement;

(5) how many and what percentage of children in special schools in the city of Leicester and in the county of Leicestershire, respectively, received school meals before the recent changes in entitlement to free school meals; and how many such pupils no longer receive school meals.

Mr. Dunn: In October 1987, the latest date for which data are available, about 18,751 pupils (or 16 per cent.) in Leicestershire received free school meals, of whom 330 pupils (or 0·3 per cent.) attended special schools. Information in respect of the city of Leicester is not separately available. For further information on school meals I refer the hon. and learned Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) on 25 May.

Information on the take-up of discretionary free school milk is not collected centrally. Children whose families are in receipt of income support continue to be eligible to receive free milk at midday.

Palterton Primary School

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to allocate additional funds to Palterton primary school, Palterton, near Chesterfield for the construction of an extension for teaching accommodation.

Mr. Dunn: Capital allocations are made annually to local education authorities on the basis of plans submitted by the authority. The project at Palterton county primary school was not included in Derbyshire LEA's plans for 1988-89. Allocations in respect of prescribed expenditure are unhypothecated; it is accordingly for the authority to determine how to deploy its resources.

Zoological Society of London

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what addition he proposes to make to the Universities Funding Council budget in respect of the switch of responsibility for the research role of the Zoological Society of London from the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Jackson: The transfer of responsibility for the funding of the Institute of Zoology will be accompanied by an increase in the public funding of the universities by a sum equivalent to the institute's core funding requirement.

"Shouldn't You Become a School Governor?"

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science why the leaflet entitled "Shouldn't You Become a School Governor?" is being circulated in Scotland by his Department and by the Central Office of Information; and if he will indicate the cost of providing copies of this leaflet in Scotland.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has made no arrangements for the distribution of this leaflet in Scotland, since the provisions to which it relates apply only to England and Wales.

City Technology College, Lincoln

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) on what basis his Department has held any discussions with members or officials of Lincolnshire county council education committee about the possible use of (a) South Park school, Lincoln and (b) any other local education authority school in Lincoln as a city technology college; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether his Department has held any discussions about the possibility of establishing a city technology college in Lincoln; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has had no discussions with members or officials of the Lincolnshire LEA concerning the use of any specific LEA school as a city technology college. Discussions have taken place, on three occasions in the period between November 1986 and February 1988, to give the local authority and the business community general information on the establishment of CTCs.

Primary School Teachers

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department regarding the number and distribution of primary school teachers in the maintained sector with formal qualifications or training in (a) mathematics and (b) science, beyond GCE O-level; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In March 1987, there were an estimated 17,500 full-time and 2,200 part-time teachers in maintained nursery and primary schools in England, who had a post-A-level qualification in which mathematics was a main or second subject, or who had in the previous five years attended an in-service course in mathematics of at least one term's full-time equivalent duration. In addition, a further 4,300 full-time and 900 part-time teachers had A-level mathematics or equivalent.

The corresponding figures for science were 22,700 full-time and 3,500 part-time with a post-A-level qualification, and a further 8,900 full-time and 2,000 part-time teachers with a science A-level or equivalent.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will estimate the number and proportion of primary schools in the maintained sector that have a member of the teaching staff with identifiable knowledge or experience in (a) mathematics and (b) science; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In March 1987 an estimated 11,400 primary schools in England—57 per cent.—had at least one teacher with a post-A-level qualification that had mathematics as the main or second subject or who had attended, in the previous five years, an in-service course in mathematics of at least one term's full-time duration or equivalent. The corresponding figure for science was 13,800—69 per cent.

All primary schools teach mathematics and almost all teach science and must therefore have at least one teacher with experience of teaching those subjects.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to his Department as to the numbers or approximate numbers of primary school teachers in the maintained sector who have undertaken in-service training wholly or largely in (a) mathematics and (b) science, in recent years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Estimates based on a 1987 survey sample of full-time and part-time teachers in maintained nursery and primary schools in England, who identified themselves as having attended courses, are as follows:

	Mathematics	Science
Teachers who attended a course of at least 20 days full-time equivalent duration in the years 1982-1986.	5,200	2,900
Teachers who had had attended a course of less than 20 days full-time equivalent duration in the months September-December 1986.	17,200	11,600
Teachers in either or both of the above categories.	21,400	14,100

Primary Schools (Mathematics and Science)

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information is available to Her Majesty's inspectors as to the provision of advisory services, support and in-service training in each local education authority for (a) mathematics in primary schools and (b) science in primary schools; whether such provision is earmarked or specifically identifiable; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information available to the inspectorate indicates that the provision of all these services varies widely in extent and quality. The vast majority of LEAs have advisers both for primary schools and for mathematics and science. Some have funds at their disposal and a small but growing number have the support of advisory teachers.

The practice of earmarking funds for the support of mathematics and science in primary schools also varies. It is for each LEA to decide how best to utilise the resources at its disposal, and to determine whether the provision is of appropriate quality.

Her Majesty's inspectorate is monitoring the operation of the LEA training grant scheme, and will report in due course upon specific aspects, including the extent to which it serves the needs of the national curriculum and makes reference to mathematics and science provision for primary schools.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what specific grant provision has been made in each recent year to support provision or training related to (a) mathematics in primary schools and (b) science in primary schools; and if he will publish a table showing the amount of such grants and the local education authorities involved in each year.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Specific grant has been available to support local education authorities' expenditure on the in-service training of teachers of mathematics since 1983, and of science since 1984. Total amounts of grant, which cover the training of teachers in primary and secondary schools, are as follows:

	Mathematics teachers £ million	Science teachers £ million	DES circular
1983-84	2·1	—	3/83
1984-85	1·98	1·98	4/84
1985-86	1·98	1·98	3/85
1986-87	1·763	1·763	1/86
1987-88	3·85	3·85	6/86
[1]1988-89	4·4	4·4	9/87

[1] Estimated.

Since the introduction of the LEA training grants scheme in 1987-88, LEAs have had discretion to supplement these amounts with grant from their allocations for local priorities. Allocations to individual authorities and details of the types of training attracting grant are included in the Department's circulars referred to above, copies of which are in the Library.

Universities Funding Council

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce the appointment of the chairman and chief executive of the proposed Universities Funding Council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am pleased to announce appointments to both posts: Lord Chilver FRS FEng, currently vice-chancellor of Cranfield Institute of Technology, and soon to return to private industry, will be the first chairman; and Sir Peter Swinnerton-Dyer KBE FRS, currently chairman of the University Grants Committee, the first chief executive. The Universities Funding Council and the universities will be well served by this formidable team.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lebanon

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further representations have been made regarding United Kingdom citizens kidnapped in Lebanon.

Mr. Mellor: We continue to call on those Governments or organisations with influence over the hostage takers to use their influence to secure the unconditional release of those concerned.

In the gathering of information about our hostages, every lead is being followed up. Her Majesty's Embassy in Beirut is doing all it can, in very difficult circumstances. We also remain in touch with middle eastern and other Governments.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mrs. Chalker: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is an equal opportunity employer and is pursuing the 1984 programme of action for equal opportunities for women in the Civil Service. Equal opportunity officers were appoined in the diplomatic and aid wings in 1984.

The diplomatic wing has adopted a number of measures to allow officers to combine career interests with domestic responsibilities. Flexible working hours were formally introduced in 1987. Provision has been made for part-time work, and job sharing. A more flexible approach has been adopted to requests for special unpaid leave for domestic reasons. Subject to operational requirements joint postings are arranged whenever possible where both partners in a marriage are members of the diplomatic service. Further details of these arrangements are given in the booklet "How to Cope with Changes in Domestic Responsibility . . . and still have a job", a copy of which is being placed in the Library of the House.

We are updating our programme of voluntary ethnic monitoring of staff in post. We also monitor recruitment and training. We recruit nationally and from all sectors of society. We advertise in the ethnic minority press in addition to the national and regional press and in inner-city jobcentres in London. Our recruitment literature stresses that we are an equal opportunity employer. We work with the national and regional press on articles about the work of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. We issue guidance to officers on aspects of equal opportunities (eg sexual harassment). Special courses on equal opportunities are arranged for officers dealing with personal management. Equal opportunities is included in all management courses.

Similar arrangements have been made in the aid wing, which in addition promotes attendance on internal and external women-only courses, and trains members of promotion boards on equal opportunities.

Japan

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Foreign Minister of Japan; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend last met Mr. Uno in the margins of the OECD ministerial council meeting in Paris on 18 May. They discussed political and economic subjects of mutual interest.

Cuba

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to visit Cuba.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. and learned Friend has no present plans to do so.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 24-25 May.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and I attended the Foreign Affairs Council on 24 May. There was a useful discussion of outstanding points on detailed follow-up to the European Council. Some were resolved: others were referred for further discussion and resolution at the June Foreign Affairs Council.

The Council agreed to establish a 15 million ecu programme to support Community-wide exchanges involving young people between the ages of 15 and 25. The programme will run for three years from 1 January 1989: the Commission also has authority to spend up to 3·55 mecu this year on such exchanges.

The Council endorsed the text of the EC/CMEA joint declaration which, when signed later this month, will open the way for improved co-operation in various fields between the Community and CMEA member states.

The Council discussed dates for the 1989 European Parliament elections, and the Foreign Ministers, meeting as a Committee of Representatives of the Member States, discussed nominations to the European Court of Justice; they will return to both topics.

The sixth EC/Israel Co-operation Council, held in the margins of the FAC, reviewed the working of the EC/Israel co-operation agreement, and considered outstanding trade and tax difficulties. The Community also stressed its concern that agreed measures giving preferential access to EC markets to Palestinian producers in the occupied territories should be implemented without further delay. Prospects for the middle east peace process were discussed separately.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Lester: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mrs. Chalker: The usual forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present, 14 meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for June.

The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 6 June to discuss the Commission's proposals on the liberalisation of capital movements.

Agriculture Ministers will meet informally on 6-7 June for bilateral discussions on the 1988-89 price-fixing proposals and income aids. These discussions will continue at a formal Council on 13-14 June whose agenda also includes veterinary inspection fees; quick frozen foodstuffs; materials and articles in contact with food; control of food additives; extraction solvents; and health problems affecting intra-Community trade in meat products.

The Internal Market Councils on 7 and 22 June will discuss a number of measures relevant to the completion of the single market.

The Social Affairs Council which meets on 9 June is expected to adopt the directive proscribing four specified carcinogens and will consider common positions, under the cooperation procedure, on the draft directives on benzene and exposure limits. The Council will also discuss the draft directives on carcinogens (framework); health and safety at the workplace; minimum workplace requirements; and equal treatment in social security.

The Energy Council will meet on 9 June and will consider the Commission's analysis of potential obstacles to the creation of an internal market in energy; a paper on co-operation between major electricity utilities and private generators based on renewable energy sources, waste energy, and combined heat and power; and a report on the implementation by member states of Council recommendations on encouragement of investment in solid fuels in the industrial, public building and district heating sectors.

There will also be discussion of possible acceleration of discrete energy efficiency investments by means of third party financing, and of the Commission's review of member states' energy policies in the context of the Community's energy objectives agreed to 1995.

The Foreign Affairs Council meets on 13/14 June. The Council will discuss the implementation of the European Council Conclusions on financing the Community. It will also discuss a Commission paper setting out possible broad guidelines for the approach to the forthcoming renegotiation of the Lomé convention, and will have a further meeting with the European Parliament on the extension of the Food Aid Framework Regulation. Discussions are also expected to cover progress made in negotiations with Hungary on a trade and co-operation agreement; relations between the Community and the United States; and the dates of the 1989 European Parliament elections.

The Environment Council meets on 16 June to discuss Commission proposals on large combustion plants; the protection of the ozone layer; major accident hazards; vehicle emissions (small cars); the reduction of wastes from the production of titanium oxide; and the five year programme illustrating the favourable impact of environmental projects on employment.

The Transport Council will meet on 20/21 June to discuss a number of important outstanding transport issues, including road haulage market access, vehicle weights and dimensions, vehicle taxation, transport infrastructure, shipping, through-transit problems, drivers' hours and combined transport. Other subjects that may also be added to the agenda for this meeting are; access to road haulage profession; vehicle testing and relations with IACO (aviation).

The Fisheries Council is expected to meet on 1 June to discuss the tuna market regime; control-reporting of Member States; technical conservation in the Baltic sea; additional catch quotas for Greenland; change in migration of western mackerel stock; and relations with third countries.

The Industry Council meets on 24 June to consider the future of ECSC steel production quotas, and rules on providing state aid for the Community steel industry.

The European Council to be held in Hanover on 27/28 June is expected to concentrate on the progress being made towards the completion of the single market and setting guidelines for future priorities.

The Research Council will meet on 29 June. The provisional agenda anticipates the formal adoption of the Drive, Delta, Bureau of Community Reference and science programmes and an extension of the biotechnology programme. The Council will discuss the fusion programme and the extension to the JET statutes and will consider a common position and common orientations for the 1988-91 programme of work of the joint research centre.

It may also be possible for the Council to adopt common positions on the AIM programme and the ECLAIR programme. There will be discussion of the relationship between EC and EUREKA programmes, of the relationship of Community research activity to technical norms and standards, and of bioethical issues on the basis of communications from the Commission. Some discussion is also possible of the Japanese ideas for a human frontier science programme.

The Telecommunications Council on 30 June is likely to discuss the Commission's Green Paper on the development of the Common Market for telecommunications services and equipment; a proposed Council directive which the Commission is expected to submit shortly on the opening up of public purchasing in telecommunications; and a possible agreement on a common European emergency number. It may also discuss satellite high definition television standards.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Swiss Companies

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has to how many acquisitions by United Kingdom companies of Swiss companies of a significant size were made in 1987; how many of these were contested bids; and how many were agreed.

Mr. Maude: United Kingdom companies are not required to register overseas acquisitions of companies. However, transactions identified from published sources involving United Kingdom companies acquiring Swiss companies during 1987 are as follows. There is no available information on whether any of these acquisitions were contested, or whether there were other bids which were contested and failed.

Acquiring company	Swiss company acquired
John Crowther	Wollimex AG
Queen's Moat Houses	Hotel Admiral

This list does not include purchase of minority stakes or assets in Swiss companies.

Switzerland (Departmental Discussions)

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions have been held by his Department with the Swiss authorities since 1982; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department holds regular discussions with the Swiss authorities at both ministerial and official level. A wide range of matters of mutual interest are discussed including international trade policy, European trade and industrial issues and bilateral trade relations.

Single European Market

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which five business schools have been asked to meet Ministers to discuss the need for extra courses tailored for the single market in 1992; and what additional resources will be offered for these courses.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. and noble friend has written to: Ashridge management college; Cranfield school of management; Henley management college; Manchester business school; London business school and City university. The purpose of the meeting is to consider what preparations they are making for 1992. The question of additional resources does not arise at this stage.

South Africa

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the level of British disinvestment from South Africa since January 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: The latest available information in complete detail, on United Kingdom net direct investment in South Africa since 1983, is as follows. There is no information on United Kingdom portfolio investment abroad, by country.

United Kingdom investment in South Africa (1983-86) by component

Note: Components may not sum to the total because of rounding.

Ceramic Industry

Ms. Walley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met representatives from the ceramic industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I last met representatives of the ceramic industry at a reception for the British Ceramic Confederation on 28 October 1987 at the House of Commons.

As the hon. Member knows, my Department is concerned only with the domestic pottery section of the ceramic industry. The remaining sectors are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Intermediaries (Commission)

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made in requiring company representatives and tied agents to disclose remuneration following his decision to require LAUTRO to require full disclosure of commission by intermediaries.

Mr. Maude: It is for the Securities and Investments Board and the self-regulating organisations to draw up rules on investment business under the Financial Services Act, but I am confident that, in the period before automatic full disclosure of commissions by intermediaries is required, they will work to develop a system of disclosure of expenses of selling through company representatives.

The Secretary of State's decision on LAUTRO was whether or not to give leave to its recognition by the board. LAUTRO amended its rules so as to require full disclosure of commissions from January 1 1990. The Secretary of State concluded that, as amended, LAUTRO's rules were not significantly anti-competitive, and accordingly gave leave.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he received a copy of the report by Peat Marwick, commissioned by the Securities and Investments Board on the disclosure of remuneration and expenses of company representatives and tied agents; whether he has met the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board to discuss its recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I received a copy of this report when it was published by the Securities and Investments Board on May 17 1988, and expect to discuss it with the chairman of the board shortly.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what estimate he has made of the number of intermediaries who will, as a result of his decision on the LAUTRO rules regarding commission disclosure, apply to become tied agents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: I have made no estimate. It is for intermediaries themselves to decide whether to be independent or to become tied agents.

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if it remains his policy to ensure equivalence of disclosure of remuneration by independent intermediaries and company representatives; what form will this take; and if he will make a statement as to when he expects the full details to be known.

Mr. Maude: Under the rules made under the Financial Services Act, independent intermediaries will be required to disclose fully their commission to all investors from January 1 1990. The regulatory bodies under the Act will use the intervening period to prepare the way for disclosure of expenses of selling through company representatives.

Travel Companies (Exchange Rate)

Mr. Sean Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) whether any estimate is available to him of the amount which holiday travel companies will gain as a result of movements in the exchange rate of the pound sterling in recent months;

(2) if he will seek powers to compel holiday travel companies to refund to customers any excess profit arising from the movement in the exchange rate of the pound sterling in recent months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: No estimates are available of the benefits to the travel industry of recent favourable movements in the sterling exchange rate. Whether or not a refund can be expected by a consumer in any particular case is entirely a civil matter and not for Government intervention. The terms of the consumer's contract with the tour operator will indicate whether or not he is entitled to a refund in these circumstances, and it will be for him to pursue the matter with the company concerned.

Fire Safety

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will estimate the likely effect of the new furniture fire safety regulations on inventory charges to suppliers of furnishing fabrics arising from dual stocking for domestic and foreign markets.

Mr. Butcher: It is not practicable to provide a worthwhile estimate of the possible effect of the draft furniture fire safety regulations on inventory changes arising from dual stocking although if manufacturers and wholesalers adopt this course there will undoubtedly be some additional cost.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what estimate he has made of the effect on United Kingdom exports of fabrics to Australia arising from the 40 per cent. import duty rate on heavier grades instead of 2 per cent. following implementation of the proposed new furniture fire safety regulations.

Mr. Butcher: No estimate has been made of the effects on exports to any particular country, either in respect of tariffs or non-tariff barriers, of the proposed new furniture fire safety regulations. The regulations will not apply to exports.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what consideration he gave in formulating the new furniture fire safety regulations to the effect of fire retardant treatments on the weight of fabrics for export.

Mr. Butcher: The draft Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations will exclude exports. Any effect on the weight of fabrics resulting from fire retardant treatment from the United Kingdom market has not been a major consideration in drafting these regulations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what estimate he has made of the impact of the new furniture fire safety regulations on exports to non-EEC countries.

Mr. Butcher: No such estimate has been made.

Nationalised Industries

Mr. Page: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made in implementing the current programme of references of nationalised industries to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; and what further references are planned.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The commission's report on the Welsh water authority was published on 18 May, and I expect to publish the report on the Post Office Counters services shortly. The Commission are currently investigating British Coal's capital investment and British Rail's provincial services.

Further references will relate to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and, once the King's Cross investigation is completed, London Underground.

SCOTLAND

Health Boards (Expenditure)

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the main areas of health spending in health boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Health boards' summarised accounts for 1986-87 show main areas of spending as follows:

	£ million
Recurrent
Hospital services	1,264
Community health services	131
Family practitioner services	437
Headquarters administration	59
Associated services (eg nurse training, local health councils etc)	19
Capital
Hospital and community health	99
Total	2,009

Forestry

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the overall target for afforestation of upland areas in Britain; and when he expects this target to be reached.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The present target for afforestation in Great Britain, excluding planting under the proposed farm woodland scheme, is 33,000 hectares a year. There is no separate target for afforestation in upland areas.

Mental Illness

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the amount spent on mental illness in each health board for each year since 1979 at 1979 prices.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The table shows health boards' expenditure on mental illness in each year from 1981-82 to 1986-87. Information is not available for years before 1981-82.

In the early years of the survey of expenditure, some anomalies in recording were present, which were subsequently corrected. These are noted in the footnotes.

Local Authorities (Statistics)

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total rateable value, needs assessments, population, total expenditure and rateable value per head in total, for local authorities in Scotland, in each year from 1979-80 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is set out in the table.

	Total rateable value £ million	Needs assessments £ million	Total population at 30 June	Relevant expenditure £ million	Rateable value per head £	Relevant expenditure per head £
1979-80	1,218	n/a	5,167,000	2,112	236	409
1980-81	1,255	n/a	5,153,300	2,520	244	489
1981-82	1,281	n/a	5,149,500	2,799	249	544
1982-83	1,296	2,448	5,166,557	3,010	251	583
1983-84	1,321	2,531	5,150,405	3,190	256	619
1984-85	1,325	2,658	5,145,722	3,340	258	649

1988-89	3,220	3,566	n/a	4,464	630	873

Notes:
(1) 1982-83 was the first year in which client group assessments of relative expenditure need were used.
(2) The change in total rateable value in 1985-86 was caused by a revaluation.
(3) The population estimates for 1988-89 are not yet available. The population as at 30 June 1987 has therefore been used.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of local authorities which spent, respectively, above or below (a) their assessed spending need and (b) any expenditure guidance issued in each year from 1981-82 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is set out in the table.

Number of authorities

1981-82	n.a.	n.a.	55	10
1982-83	33	32	37	28

1987-88	34	31	35	30
1988-89	30	35	31	34

Notes:
(1) Client group assessments of relative expenditure need were not used prior to 1982-83.
(2) The latest figures available about authorities actual or planned expenditure have been used.

Language Assistants

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many language assistants went to which countries under the auspices of the exchange of language assistants scheme in the last year for which figures are available; and how many come from which countries in each exchange.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The language assistants scheme administered on behalf of my Department by the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges does not operate on the basis of exchanges but of individual appointments arranged with reciprocating countries. In 1987-88 the central bureau made the following Scottish appointments:

Country	Outgoing assistants	Incoming assistants
France	199	192
West Germany	56	63
Spain	35	13
Austria	29	9
Italy	10	6
Switzerland	3	7

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Rifkind: My Department has recently completed a survey of the ethnic origins of staff in the Scottish Office and associated Departments as part of the nationwide survey of civil servants. This information is being kept up to date by asking new entrants to the Department to complete a questionnaire showing their ethnic origin. It is my Department's intention to review the results of the survey with a view to determining what future action should be taken to encourage applications from ethnic minorities for posts in the Scottish Office.

In compliance with the Equal Opportunities Commission code of practice, facilities are offered to Scottish Office staff to enable them to combine a career with domestic responsibilities and to provide continuity of employment in such circumstances. These facilities include flexible working hours, special leave, reinstatement, re-employment and part-time working. Further opportunity for part-time working should be created as a result of a formal job sharing agreement which has recently been concluded between the Department and the trade union side.

In addition, there are developmental training courses exclusively for female officers which they can attend at the Civil Service College. The Department maintains a record, to which staff have access, of child care facilities available from local government.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average length of custodial sentence of female prisoners in Scotland in 1986 and 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The average length of custodial sentence imposed on female offenders in 1986 was 111 days and the provisional figure for 1987 is 115 days. Females sentenced to life imprisonment or indeterminate detention are not included in the above calculation.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prisoners were transferred from (a) Scotland to Northern Ireland and (b) Northern Ireland to Scotland in 1987; and under which section of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 such transfers were carried out.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: None.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons have been (a) killed and (b) injured in Scotland in 1987 as a result of paramilitary activity; and if he will break down the figures specifying whether the paramilitaries were (i) from Western Europe, (ii) from Northern Ireland, (iii) from the Republic of Ireland, (iv) from other parts of the world and (v) of unknown origin.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No such deaths or injuries occurred in Scotland during 1987.

Planned Maintenance Programme (Lothian)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if, in view of the deterioration in the fabric of Linlithgow primary school, he will make funds available to Lothian region council's planned maintenance programme.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Substantial resources have been made available to Lothian regional council for both current and capital expenditure on the maintenance of school buildings in the current financial year. It is for the regional council itself to determine its own priorities for allocating these resources, and I understand that the council is now making arrangements for necessary repairs to be carried out at Linlithgow primary school.

Scottish Office, Edinburgh

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the cost of providing office accommodation for him and other Ministers in his Department and their associated offices in Old St. Andrew's House, Edinburgh, and (b) the cost of removal there.

Mr. Rifkind: As regards capital expenditure, the final costs are not yet available, and I therefore cannot add to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) on 9 March 1988. The approximate cost of the removal is £2,000.

Rating Reform

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each region and island authority in Scotland the current state of registration of persons for collection of the community charge including (a) number of forms issued, (b) percentage of forms issued, (c) numbers of completed forms returned and (d) percentage of completed forms returned.

Mr. Lang: Detailed information on the progress of community charge registration is not available centrally, but it is clear that in many areas very high rates of return of forms have been achieved in the initial canvass.

New Towns

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is yet in a position to give a substantive reply to the question about new towns tabled by the hon. Member for East Kilbride for priority written answer on 28 April.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 25 May.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each of the Scottish new towns for the period 1974-75 to 1989-90, inclusive, the actual or estimated (a) capital expenditure, gross and net of capital receipts, (b) revenue expenditure and (c) capital debt, expressed in cash and as per capita amounts.

Mr. Lang: The information requested concerning the development corporations' capital and current expenditure, capital receipts and loan debt is available in the annual accounts published in each corporation's annual reports for the period 1974-75 to 1986-87. The corporation's annual reports for the year 1987-88 are to be laid before Parliament on 13 July.

Information on the estimated capital and revenue expenditure of the new towns in aggregate for the years 1987-88 to 1990-91 is contained within the Government's expenditure plans 1988-89 to 1990-91 presented to Parliament in January of this year.

Information on population within the designated area of each Scottish new town for the years 1974-75 to 1989-90 was included in the answer given to the hon. Member on 25 May.

Fetlar

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will establish an inquiry into the circumstances in which unemployed workers have been attracted to the island of Fetlar with offers of jobs renovating old croft houses as part of a £200,000 publicly funded project, only to find on their arrival that no jobs exist; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This is a matter for the Sheltand Islands council. I understand that the circumstances have already been investigated by the Commissioner for Local Administration and that the Shetland Islands council has his report.

Forestry Commission

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much gross income was derived in each of the last five years by the Forestry Commission from the use of its land and facilities by all forms of rally sport.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is available only for car rallies, and is as follows:

1984	331,000
1985	395,000
1986	323,000
1987	436,000
1988	349,000

Edinburgh Bypass

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to appoint a public inquiry into the alternative routes for the M8 extension to the Edinburgh bypass.

Mr. Rifkind: I have already made provisional arrangements for a public local inquiry to be held in the autumn for the purpose of considering the objections received to the draft orders published by the Scottish Development Department in March 1988.

Cash Limits

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he proposes to announce any changes in the cash limits for 1988-89 within his responsibility.

Mr. Rifkind: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the cash limit for Class XVI, Vote 14: "Prisons, Hospital and Community Health Services, etc, Scotland" will be increased by £86,100,000 from £1,783,653,000 to £1,869,753,000. Most of the increase—£86 million—follows the decision to implement the recommendations of the review bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine from 1 April 1988. The remaining £100,000 is the amount allocated to health boards following the error of calculation of the retail prices index as announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 18 December 1987.

The cash limit for Class XVI, Vote 15: "Education, Arts, Libraries and Social Work, Scotland" will be increased by £796,000 from £197,720,000 to £198,516,000. This is to allow the disbursement of funds to various voluntary sector bodies and teachers' benevolent funds as a consequence of the earlier announced error in the retail prices index.

Those changes represent a net charge on the reserve of £86,896,000 and will not therefore increase the planned total of public expenditure.

Historic Buildings and Monuments Directorate

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement on the report of the efficiency scrutiny of the directly employed labour of the historic buildings and monuments directorate of the Scottish Development Department.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The report was submitted at the end of February. Copies are being placed in the Library of both Houses today. I have agreed that copies should be circulated to the appropriate bodies with a view to starting the necessary consultations on the recommendations contained in the report.

The report recognises that the primary task of the directly employed labour is the conservation of historic masonry and that the work force deploys specialist skills and experience of a high order with an impressive dedication to its task. The report suggests that to give value for money the directorate should continue to develop its existing sophisticated management information system, increase the amount of work contracted out and continually question how the existing service can be improved.

The main recommendations for obtaining better value for money are:

- the integration of maintenance expenditure and DEL staff costs in a single vote;
- extend contracting out of non-historic work and reduce DEL numbers;
- review the present Estate of monuments against modern criteria of the merits and the liabilities of each site;
- achieve further savings on goods and services purchased;
- change various practices, set up targets and establish quantified performance indicators for the DEL force;
- re-assess the geographic working areas of each DEL Depot;
- install an integrated computer network to give Area access to the management information system.

Implementation of the recommendations could lead to a reduction in annual costs of at least £300,000 per annum after three years. The recommendations will be carefully considered in the light of the consultations about to be undertaken.

Student Awards

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he proposes to take in relation to applications for student awards for session 1987-88 which were not received by 31 December 1987.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has decided that the period for acceptance of valid applications for student awards for session 1987-88 should, exceptionally, be extended to 30 June 1988. He has taken this step in view of the fact that a small proportion of students have apparently relied hitherto on informal final reminders from their academic institutions that they should apply before the closing date, which could not be provided on this occasion. We are making arrangements to advise the individuals and institutions concerned immediately.

Nurses

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the total amount expended on wage for (a) nurses and (b) midwives for each health board in (i) 1987-88 and (ii) the expected expenditure in 1988-89.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 24 May 1988]: Complete information on actual exenditure incurred by each board in 1987-88 will not be available until their accounts are submitted later this summer. For 1988-89, we have announced that an additional £92 million is to be made available in Scotland to finance the full additional cost of the review body awards. The precise attribution of this amount among the various categories of staff is currently being assessed. Health boards will be informed of their additional allocations shortly.

Rent and Rate Rebates

Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the extent to which the recent changes in rent rebates and rates rebates are causing hardship to elderly tenants in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Portillo: I have been asked to reply.

The new housing benefit system ensures that a person's resources after paying housing costs including 80 per cent. of rates will not be below their level of income support entitlement.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Servants (Pensions)

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on the pension arrangements for staff of Government Communications Headquarters who formally served in the armed forces;

(2) if he will make a statement on the calculation of reckonable service for pension purposes of civil servants who previously served in the armed forces during peacetime.

Mr. Brooke: There are separate pension schemes for civil servants and for armed forces personnel. Staff employed by the Government communications headquarters are, in general, members of the Principal Civil Service pension scheme. However, an individual formally serving with the armed forces would normally be a member of the armed forces pension scheme and receive appropriate pension benefits from that scheme.

The armed forces pension scheme provides for the transfer of accrued pension rights by those who have left the services since 1 April 1975. As the armed forces pension scheme is a member of the public sector transfer club, a civil servant who transferred benefits from the armed forces scheme would receive broadly year for year credit in the Civil Service scheme. The armed forces scheme has no provision for those who left before April 1975 to transfer pension benefits to another scheme. It is not normally possible, therefore, for a civil servant to reckon service with the forces that ended before April 1975 towards a Civil Service pension, unless the individual concerned comes within the scope of the limited concessionary arrangements provided for under the Superannuation Act 1946 and the Superannuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1948. The main concessions in regulations made under these Acts are that those who entered the Civil Service between 3 September 1939 and 30 June 1950, after serving in the armed forces during that period, could reckon their forces service as if it had been unestablished service in the Civil Service; and to enable national service to reckon if it interrupted service in the Civil Service.

Hereditament Maps

Mr. Nicholas Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish his reasons for requiring that hereditament maps should be sent from provincial offices to the public record office at Kew, London.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The valuation office is required to release these maps to the public record office in accordance with the provisions of the Public Records Act 1958, in order that they may be preserved and form a permanent source of public reference. The public will now be able to examine the maps alongside the relevant field books which are already preserved in the public record office.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Brooke: The Treasury has taken a number of positive measures to encourage equal opportunities. All in-house management training courses include an equal opportunities element. External development training courses only for women are advertised in the Department and have been attended by a number of women. Training and personnel managers attend a number of equal opportunity seminars and conferences throughout the year which add to their understanding of equal opportunity issues.

Job sharing, part-time working and career breaks to assist with individual domestic circumstances are encouraged where practicable.

Monitoring of ethnic recruitment is also undertaken to determine whether there are any signs of discrimination. There is no evidence to show that there is.

Payroll Giving Scheme

Sir David Price: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employers have now joined the payroll giving scheme, under the terms of section 202 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

Mr. Brooke: About 2,600 schemes have been set up by employers. In some cases an employer may have more than one scheme for separate payrolls.

Tax Forms (Reply-paid Envelopes)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what date the Inland Revenue ceased the practice of providing reply-paid envelopes for the return of tax forms; and whether he will estimate the savings to be made to the revenue in a 12-month period.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 29 January 1988 at column 420. The Inland Revenue ceased, from 5 April 1988, to issue reply-paid envelopes for the return of income tax returns and other correspondence except where payment of tax is being requested (where the present first-class reply service will remain unchanged) and in a few other special circumstances.

The savings to the revenue in the 12 months to April 1989 are estimated to be in excess of £2·0 million.

Management and Computer Consultancy Contracts

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list each management or computer consultant contract in the Inland Revenue as at 1 January 1987, giving in each case the name of the consultancy firm and the subject of the assignment.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As at 1 January 1987 the Inland Revenue had the following management and computer consultancy contracts:

	Assignment
PA Computers and Telecommunications Ltd.	Project Management and Control Operational Research
Computer Sciences Company Ltd.	Application Software
ICL	Systems Software and Technical Support
Peat Marwick McClintock	Financial Systems Taxes Clerical Work Measurement
Institute of Manpower Studies	Personnel Planning
AC Consultancy Services	Operational Research
National Coal Board[1]	Operational Research

[1] Now British Coal Corporation.

Non-residents' Personal Reliefs

Mr. Gordon Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Exchequer of the measures proposed in clause 30 of the Finance (No. 2) Bill relating to non-residents' personal reliefs and the number of tax units who would benefit from the measure were it to be introduced in 1988-89.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 20 May 1988]: Detailed statistics are not available to make a firm estimate of the cost of the measures in clause 30 of the Finance Bill. However, including the cost of the change to independent taxation for those taxpayers affected, it is thought that the additional relief is unlikely to exceed £15 million to £20 million in a full year. The overall cost of the change is included in the cost of independent taxation given in paragraph 36 of annex 4 to chapter 4 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1988-89.

Precise figures are not available, but it is known that at least 65,000 non-resident taxpayers (counting husband and wife as one) currently benefit from personal reliefs under the provisions of section 278 Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988.

CIVIL SERVICE

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Luce: The Office of the Minister for the Civil Service is an equal opportunity employer. Its personnel policies are designed to ensure that all staff, no matter what their age, colour, disability, ethnic or national origin, marital status, race or sex have equality of opportunity for employment and advancement solely on the basis of their ability, qualifications and suitability for the work.

Some examples of the Department's equal opportunity initiatives are: the introduction of a career break scheme; job sharing and part-time working; promotion board and recruitment monitoring.

THE ARTS

Arts Council (Grants)

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Minister for the Arts what grants were given by the Arts Council in 1985-86 and 1987-88 to (a) the British Theatre Association, (b) the Puppet Centre Trust, (c) the Book Trust, (d) the Poetry Society, (e) the Minority Arts Advisory Service, (f) Shape and (g) the National Association of Arts centres; and what other similar arts support and service organisations have received such grants in those years.

Mr. Luce: The information requested is as follows:

	1985-86 (£)	1987-88 (£)
British Theatre Association	16,000	—
Puppet Centre Trust	6,000	—
Book Trust	60,000	60,000
Poetry Society	95,000	112,000
Minority Arts Advisory Service	17,300	20,500
Shape	23,980	[1]60,000
National Association of Arts Centres	9,900	3,000
Dance Umbrella	31,000	33,250

[1] Devolved to Greater London Arts Association.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Arts, what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Luce: The Office of Arts and Libraries is an equal opportunity employer. Its personnel policies are designed to ensure that all staff, no matter what their age, colour, disability, ethnic or national origin, marital status, race or sex, have equality of opportunity for employment and advancement soley on the basis of their ability, qualifications and suitability for the work.

Some examples of the Department's equal opportunity initiatives are: the introduction of a career break scheme; job sharing and part-time working; promotion board and recruitment monitoring.

Libraries

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many representations he has received during the past 12 months by members of the public, asking to pay to borrow more books than the rules of the basic library service allow, as proposed in paragraph 5.11 of the public libraries Green Paper.

Mr. Luce: I have received no direct representations about this from members of the public in the last 12 months.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the library authorities who presently do not charge commercial companies for their use of the authority's (a) reference, (b) information and (c) lending services.

Mr. Luce: This is a matter for local authorities' discretion. No central record of this information is kept.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what was the cost of (a) producing and (b) printing the public libraries Green Paper.

Mr. Luce: The cost to my office of producing the Green Paper was about £9,000.

The costs of printing, publishing and distributing it are borne by Her Majesty's Stationery Office, which recovers its costs from sales revenue.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts on what occasions in the last 10 years a Minister for the Arts has used his statutory powers to ensure that a library authority provided a free and comprehensive basic service under the 1964 Act.

Mr. Luce: No Minister responsible for the public library service in England has used his statutory powers under the 1964 Act to direct an authority.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish the detailed figures which led him to set an initial target of £50 million gross income a year for charged services in his Green Paper on public libraries.

Mr. Luce: The £50 million is a cautious assessment of the gross income which library authorities in England could earn if they used the full range of means proposed in the Green Paper. The figure is based on projections using the amount which the higher earning authorities now raise.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish tables which show the rate at which each public library authority in England and Wales charges for (a) notifying library users that reserved books are available for borrowing and (b) failure to return borrowed books on time.

Mr. Luce: This information is published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in "Public Library Statistics", copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what criteria he used in coming to the conclusion that public libraries could be more cost-effective.

Mr. Luce: I have not reached any firm conclusions that public libraries could be more cost-effective. However, all library authorities should test regularly that their services are cost-effective and delivering value for money. My Green Paper, "Financing our public library service: four subjects for debate," seeks to explore ways in which public library services may be made more cost-effective.

In my answer to an earlier question from the hon. Member today, I referred to a costing model published by my office. In addition, I am currently funding, through the British Library, the production of a manual of performance indicators for public libraries. Both these initiatives will, I hope, provide authorities with useful management tools.

Office of Arts and Libraries

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts whether the staff of the Office of Arts and Libraries contains a qualified economist or accountant employed in that capacity.

Mr. Luce: While the staff of the Office of Arts and Libraries includes no qualified accountant or economist employed in that capacity, the Department is able to draw on such professional services when it requires them from within or outside the Civil Service.

Library Authorities (Costs)

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Minister for the Arts what is his policy on the extent to which Library authorities should fully cost (a) staff time, (b) apportioned rent of premises, (c) apportioned rent of equipment, (d) apportioned rent of telephone, (e) postage, and (f) interest on capital.

Mr. Luce: As far as public library costs are concerned, I believe that library authorities will wish to calculate as accurately as possible the itemised costs of their services in the interests of good management and to test that they are achieving good value for money. "A Costing System for Public Libraries," published by the Office of Arts and Libraries in July 1987, provides a flexible model designed to assist them in this.

Museums

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has about museums disposing of items not required for display or retention.

Mr. Luce: Most national museums and galleries have carefully circumscribed powers to dispose of items from their collections either by sale, exchange or gift. I believe that this facilitates good collections management and it is my intention to grant such powers to the National gallery, Tate gallery and National Portrait gallery as part of their change to corporate status.

As I announced in the House on 20 May, I shall be initiating a wider consultation exercise on this question before reaching any final decisions. I shall be considering in the light of the response whether it would be appropriate for different collections to be treated differently in this respect.

It is for the trustees of each institution, advised by their director, to determine the extent to which their statutory powers are used. Information about items disposed of under these powers is not held centrally.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will publish in the Official Report, for each of the national museums covered by Class XIII a list of operational facilities, the dates at which any admission charges were introduced and the structure of such tariffs and any changes over the period 1979 to 1988.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 25 May 1988]: The national museums and galleries sites at which the trustees charge for admission or seek a voluntary donation are as follows:

The other information the hon. Member asks for can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will publish in the Official Report a table, covering each of the votes on Class XIII and each of the years 1979-80 to 1990-91, which analyse income other than supply grant by its source including admission charges, other charges, trading profit, miscellaneous sales revenue, support from non-Government sources, public donations and other miscellaneous income.

Mr. Luce [holding answer 25 May 1988]: It is the policy of this Government to maintain their support for museums and galleries, and the arts generally, and to do so in a way which encourages and assists arts organisations to become more self-reliant in their development and growth. Some of the national museums and galleries have been particularly successful in this; all are developing their non-Exchequer sources of funding.

The non-Exchequer receipts of the national museums and galleries that I sponsor, for the years since 1979-80, including the estimate for the current year, are as follows:

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89 (estimate)

An analysis of receipts on the basis and in the detail requested by the hon. Member is not available.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

ADAS (Charges)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will outline the remit of his Ministry's review into the Agricultural Development Advisory Service charges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My right hon. Friend has asked senior officials concerned in this Department to complete before summer a review of the first year's experience of ADAS charging, including demand for all categories of ADAS services, the costs of providing such services in relation to the results of the first year of charging and the lessons to be drawn from this experience. Staff and trade union representatives have been informed of the review and will be consulted on the implementation of any follow-up measures of concern to them.

Corn (Co-responsibility Levy)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the co-responsibility levy per tonne of corn in each European Community country and the percentage this represents of the price per tonne.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The co-responsibility levy for all cereals in all member states is 5.38 ecu per tonne. This is 3 per cent. of the intervention price for common wheat. The relationship between the levy and the intervention price does not change when they are expressed in national currencies because both are converted using the green rate applicable to cereals in each member state.

The levy is currently the following rate per tonne in each member state:

	Rate	Currency
United Kingdom	3·53	£
Germany	12·9008	DM
France	40·22	FF
Netherlands	14·462	DG
Belgium and Luxembourg	258·59	BF
Ireland	4·473	IRL
Denmark	47·102	DK
Italy	8591·86	L
Greece	712·86	DRA
Spain	829·67	PTA

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Donald Thompson: This Department has taken the following positive action:

Organised residential and non-residential development training courses solely for women managers.

Advertised opportunities for job-share and part-time work.

Notified staff of the opportunity for reinstatement and how to "keep in touch."

Established a register of staff who are interested in working reduced hours.

Contributed to the OMCS training review which will identify the scope for arranging further developmental or skills training for women. It will also identify areas where such training could be arranged for black and Asian staff.

Advertised staff vacancies in inner city job centres.

Agricultural Statistics

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when was the last time his Ministry produced a publication compiling agricultural statistics over a period of 100 years; and when he plans to publish the next compilation.

Mr. Donald Thompson: "A Century of Agricultural Statistics 1866-1966" was published in 1968. There are no plans to publish a further edition.

Nitrates

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many local meetings his Ministry has held with farmers to advise them about reducing nitrate applications in the areas where the level of nitrate exceeds the 50mg litre limit.

Mr. Gummer: Eight local meetings have been held during 1988 specifically to discuss the nitrate pollution issue and what farmers can do to help reduce nitrate leaching to water resources. These meetings form part of a publicity campaign run jointly by the Ministry and seven other interested organisations. They are not confined to particular areas but are organised wherever sufficient farmers seek information on the subject. In addition, the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service answers questions on the nitrate issue at many other meetings of farmers.

Food, Drink and Marketing Policy

Mr. Gregory: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current management objectives of his Department's food, drink and marketing policy division.

Mr. Donald Thompson: These are set out in the relevant programmes of the Ministry's MINIM 1987 publication, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Salmon

Mr. Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has reactivated his study of the economic value of British salmon fisheries.

Mr. Gummer: Following the termination of the contract for this study with Exeter university, the work is now being undertaken at Portsmouth polytechnic and is expected to last two years.

Milk

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many milk producers in Great Britain were contracted into the Community non-marketing premium schemes during the base year for the calculation of milk quotas.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 25 May 1988]: Precise figures are not available. Initial investigation indicates that about 4,500 dairy producers in Great Britain were contracted into the non-marketing of milk premium scheme during 1983. Some of these would have been able to resume milk production in time to qualify for consideration under the milk quota exceptional hardship or development award provisions.

Cereals

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the entitlement of British farmers to European small cereal producers' aid in respect of the harvests of 1987 and 1988, respectively; and what action he is taking to encourage the taking up of this entitlement.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 25 May 1988]: Farmers have until 31 July 1988 to submit claims for small cereals producer aid in respect of the 1987 harvest.

Cereal producers with not more than 100 hectares of crops and grass (excluding rough grazing) are eligible for the aid, provided that they can show that cereals co-responsibility levy has been deducted on their grain sales during the 1987-88 marketing year.

The amount payable will be £3·53 per tonne on a minimum of 3 tonnes and a maximum of 25 tonnes of grain (£88·25). However, this amount per tonne will be reduced if the total amount claimed by all producers is more than 5·35 million ecu (£3·51 million), which is the amount allocated to the United Kingdom for payment of this aid.

All producers who claimed the aid in 1987, have been sent a claim form. Others who are eligible should apply to their local MAFF divisional office for a form. I am anxious to ensure that there is the widest possible uptake of this aid.

It has been agreed that small cereal producers will continue to receive aid in respect of the 1988 harvest, but the details are still under discussion.

Badgers

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide a breakdown for each of the last five years of Government and other funding, respectively, of research into tuberculosis in badgers, including work on developing a live test and a vaccine for badgers.

Mr. Donald Thompson [holding answer 19 May 1988]: Funds provided by the Government for research into bovine tuberculosis in badgers during the last five years are as follows:

Year	Diagnostic test in live badgers	Vaccine	Other relevant work (estimated)
1983-84	12,361	78,415	91,000
1984-85	4,383	87,455	94,000
1985-86	24,598	166,734	95,000
1986-87	58,543	173,475	100,000
1987-88	313,738	43,686	102,000

Information on funding from other sources is not available.

AIDS

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the probability of the incidence of AIDS in the United Kingdom at the present time for each adult male and female over 18 years.

Mr. Newton: It is not possible to assess the probability of the incidence of AIDS in the United Kingdom at the present time for each adult male and female over 18 years. The latest published figures, which give the current prevalence of HIV infection at the end of March, show that 7,380 men and 797 women have been reported to the national surveillance centres as being HIV antibody positive. With regard to cases of AIDS, to the end of April 1,412 males and 27 females had been reported. The latest available figures for the population of the United Kingdom aged 18 and over are 20,747,900 males and 22,573,000 females. This represents rates of infection with HIV of 361 per million for males and 35 per million for females and rates of people with AIDS of 68 per million for males and 1·6 per million for females. It is necessary to interpret these figures carefully: some of the cases of AIDS will be included in the HIV figures and these HIV statistics include only those infected people who have presented for testing.

Electro-convulsive Therapy

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, by region, for each of the last three years for which figures are available (a) the number of male patients treated with electro-convulsive therapy and (b) the number of female patients treated with electro-convulsive therapy; and, in each case, what is the average number of treatments per patient.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. Member the information she seeks in the form requested as no record is kept centrally of the number or sex of patients undergoing electro-convulsive therapy. The table shows the data held centrally.

[1] The number of treatments is not the same as the number of patients treated, as some patients may undergo more than one course of treatment during the year.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies his Department has made of the effects of electro-convulsive therapy.

Mrs. Currie: It is not generally the role of the Department to commission basic clinical research. This type of research falls within the remit of other agencies such as the Medical Research Council and individual clinical researchers.

NHS Ancillary Staff

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures available for the number of ancillary staff employed in the National Health Service by scale and point or standard payroll system code under the terms and conditions of the ancillary staffs Whitley Council agreement.

Mr. Newton: The latest available information to this level of detail relates to staff in post at 31 March 1987. At this date, there were an estimated 119,000 (whole-time equivalent) ancillary staff employed by the NHS in England. Within this total, the estimated numbers by pay scale and incremental point were as shown in the table.

Thomas Connolly Moore

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the escape from a secure mental hospital of Thomas Connolly Moore.

Mrs. Currie: Mr. Moore absconded from Monyhull hospital, which is not a secure hospital, in the afternoon of 16 May and was found and returned on the morning of 17 May. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is satisfied that the level of supervision is appropriate for Mr. Moore.

Donald Hume

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps have been taken to ensure that Donald Hume is kept under secure surveillance at St. Bernard's hospital, Ealing; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that Donald Hume is currently receiving treatment in the regional secure unit at St. Bernard's hospital, Ealing. As the responsibility for the regional secure unit rests with the North West Thames regional health authority, my hon. Friend may wish to approach the chairman for further information.

Computer Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has any plans to privatise computer services currently provided by his Department.

Mr. Portillo: Government policy is to promote value for money in the management and delivery of public services. All Departments have been encouraged to consider areas of work, including computer services, which might be carried out more cheaply or more effectively under contract.

Child Abuse

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of child abuse cases on the records of each of the social service departments in the London boroughs on 30 April.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information is not available. However, we announced on 9 July 1987 that arrangements would be made for the annual collection of national statistics on child abuse. The Department is carrying out a survey for the year ending 31 March 1988, which will be followed by the introduction of an annual statistical return. It is planned to publish some provisional results from the survey later this year which will include the number of children and young persons on the child abuse register at 31 March 1988 in each local authority in England.

New-born Babies (Eye Defects)

Sir Bernard Braine: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made in improving the surveillance of new-born babies in respect of possible eye defects; when the expected recommendations from the professional bodies are likely to be made; and when appropriate action can be expected.

Mrs. Currie: The third report from the maternity services advisory committee recommended that all babies should be fully examined within 24 hours of birth by a doctor experienced in the care of the newborn. The content of the examination is a matter for the clinician.

I understand the joint working party on child health surveillance convened by the British Paediatric Association will be presenting its report later this year.

We shall consider its report carefully.

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the numbers of hotels and guest homes which have been converted to use as residential homes for the elderly.

Mrs. Currie: No information is collected centrally on the origin of premises now used as residential care homes. However, this is one of the subjects being examined in a survey of residential and nursing homes which we have commissioned from the personal social services research unit, university of Kent, and the centre for health economics, university of York, the report of which will be published later this year.

Ulcerative Colitis

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to add irritable bowel diseases to the list of exemptions from prescription charges to cover the case of sufferers from ulcerative colitis.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to do so.

NHS Review

Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if the review of the National Health Service currently being undertaken is considering the auction of hospital beds as a method of resolving priorities and raising funds.

Mr. Moore: No.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to amend the regulation under which 19-year-old school leavers can qualify for supplementary benefit payments when they are estranged from their parents.

Mr. Portillo: Supplementary benefit was replaced by income support from 11 April 1988. All 19-year-old school-leavers can qualify for income support provided they meet the normal conditions of entitlement such as availability for work and the income and capital limits. There are no plans to change this regulation.

Community Care

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if, in the light of his response to the proposals of the Central Council for the Education and Training of Social Workers, he will set out his Department's plans for the training of staff involved with community care services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The training requirements of staff working in community care are provided by a variety of bodies including local authority social services departments, health authorities, the National Health Service Training Authority and the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work. Our recent £10 million training support programme initiative for staff working with the elderly has provided a significant training boost for certain groups of staff working in the area of community care, and we are currently seeking powers, through the Health and Medicines Bill, to allow for possible expansion of the programme to take in additional staff groups. We shall consider whether further training initiatives are required when we have brought forward our proposals on community care in the light of Sir Roy Griffiths's report.

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the current arrangements for the joint planning of community care services between health authorities and (a) local authority social service departments and (b) the voluntary organisations.

Mr. Newton: The present systems for joint planning offer health authorities, local authorities, the voluntary sector and family practitioner committees valuable opportunities to develop and co-ordinate community care services. We will consider whether any changes are necessary as part of our current examination of funding mechanisms for community care, following Sir Roy Griffiths' recent report.

Attendance Allowance Unit (Blackpool)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services why a courier service is used between the Blackpool attendance allowance unit and his Department's Leeds offices; whether this leads to delays in correspondence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: An internal courier service is used to link up all DHSS offices, including Blackpool and Leeds. This does not lead to delays in correspondence and, in fact, the reliability of next day delivery is generally at least as good as first-class post. It provides the Department with a method of transferring internal correspondence cost-effectively and efficiently between all offices.

Nurses (Mobility)

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the effect that the European Communities (Amendment) Act 1986 will have upon the mobility of nurses between European Community countries, and with regard to the recognition of nursing qualifications in European Community countries.

Mr. Newton: The European Communities (Amendment) Act 1986 amends the European Communities Act 1972 so as to give legal effect in the United Kingdom to certain aspects of the Single European Act which was signed by the member states in February of 1986. The Single European Act amended the voting procedure on certain articles of the EEC treaty and introduced closer co-operation with the European Parliament. It did not affect the fundamental right of the freedom of movement for persons which is enshrined in the original EEC treaty. Directives to facilitate that right in relation to nurses responsible for general care were adopted in 1977. They provide for the co-ordination of nurse training and mutual recognition of qualifications throughout the Community. Specialist nursing qualifications which were not covered by the 1977 directives may be covered by the current proposal to provide for a general system for the recognition of higher education diplomas. The added impetus given by the Single European Act to complete the internal market by 1992 and the introduction of procedural and institutional reform may well enable this proposal to be adopted in the near future.

Fish (National Health Service)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how much fish from the Faroe Islands was purchased by the National Health Service for each of the last two years.

Mrs. Currie: No national NHS contract is held for the purchase of fish from the Faroe Islands and information is not held centrally on the suppliers of fish to individual regional or district health authorities.

Clinical Grading Structure

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 17 May 1988, Official Report, column 410, what provision he is making to ensure that health authorities are able to fill and fund posts which are currently vacant when implementing the clinical grading structure.

Mr. Newton: As in earlier years, the review body estimate of the cost of its recommendations has been based on actual pay bills for the previous year. It is for health authorities to determine their nursing establishment, having regard to the total resources available.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cervical smear tests had not been processed in the Leicestershire health district on 23rd May.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may care to contact the chairman of Leicestershire health authority.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average delay in processing cervical smear tests in the Leicestershire health district on (a) 1 January 1987, (b) 1 October 1987, (c) 1 January 1988 and (d) 1 April 1988.

Mrs. Currie: This information has been collected centrally only since October 1987. The figures are as follows:

Date	Average processing time
1 October 1987	Four weeks
1 January 1988	Seven weeks
1 April 1988	Eight weeks

I understand that the current position as on 23 May is that the average processing time is now four weeks. This meets the departmental guidance.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services, how many women had cervical cancer smear tests in Leicestershire health district in each of the months January to December 1987, and for each month in 1988.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not collected centrally in the form requested. The latest centrally held figures are for the number of smear tests carried out in the calendar year 1986. This figure is 59,332 and includes some women who had more than one test.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for each district health authority with backlogs in cervical cancer smear testing of (a) over one month, (b) between one and two months and (c) two months and over.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 17 May 1988]: There are 190 district health authorities in England. Those reporting an average processing time for cervical smear tests of more than one month as at 1 May are listed. The average processing time is shown in weeks.

Benefits

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual cost of raising the capital disregard for social security benefits to £5,000 with a level taper to £10,000.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of raising the start of the tariff income for social security benefits from £5,000 with an upper limit of £10,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The additional cost over and above that of the changes announced on 27 April 1988 would be £85 million.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the annual cost of raising the capital disregard for social security benefits to £10,000 for married couples.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The additional cost over and above that of the changes announced on 27 April 1988 would be £25 million.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of raising the disregard threshold for social security benefits from £6,000 to £7,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The annual cost would have been £24 million.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of raising the disregard threshold for income support from £6,000 to £10,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The annual cost would have been £10 million.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of raising the start of the tariff income for social security benefits to £4,000 with an upper limit of £10,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The additional cost over and above that of the changes announced on 27 April 1988 would be £55 million.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost of raising the disregard threshold for social security benefits from £6,000 to £8,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The annual cost would have been £39 million.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services what would be the cost to the Treasury of raising the capital disregard for social security purposes from the £6,000 proposed to £9,000.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 April 1988]: The annual cost would have been £52·5 million.

NHS Properties

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by region and special health authority (a) those properties which are awaiting disposal and (b) those planned for replacement; and if he will give the total estimated values of those properties for each region and the nation as a whole.

Mrs. Currie [holding answer 11 May 1988]: The information that the hon. Member seeks has now been placed in the Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action has been taken on the recommendation of the UKWMO working party on UKWMO service to wartime headquarters concerning links to county standby emergency centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The provision of such links is to be reviewed in the light of the current programme to extend the emergency communications network.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average number of days spent on remand by those remanded in custody for terrorist-type offences in the second half of 1987, with regard to cases now completed in England and Wales; and what was the number of bail applications refused, respectively.

Mr. Hurd: The cases of four people who were remanded in custody for terrorist-related offences in the second half of 1987 have now been completed. The average number of days spent on remand was 86. In each case one bail application was refused.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons in Great Britain were charged with terrorist-type offences relating to Northern Ireland in 1987; how many of those charged were released on bail; and what was the average period between remand and trial for prisoners refused bail, relating to such charges in Britain in 1987.

Mr. Hurd: During 1987 10 people in Great Britain were charged with terrorist-type offences in connection with the affairs of Northern Ireland. The charges against two of these people were later withdrawn, although one of the two was subsequently excluded from Great Britain under section 4 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. Six people are awaiting trial, one of whom has been released on bail. In the two completed cases the two people concerned were remanded into custody and were refused bail. The period between remand and trial in these two cases was 22 days and 294 days respectively.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the offences with which people initially detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1984 in Great Britain in 1987 were charged and give the outcome in each case as to acquittals, convictions and sentences imposed.

Mr. Hurd: Details of charges following detention under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 in Great Britain in 1987, and the outcome, where known, are given in the following table:

Charges brought following detention under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 in Great Britain in 1987

Charged under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984

Number charged	Section	Outcome
1	Section 9	2 years imprisonment
1	Section 10	Charges withdrawn
7	Schedule 3	1-30 days imprisonment 2-60 days imprisonment 4 fined: 1 × £30, 1 × £75, 1 × £92, 1 × £150

Charged under other legislation

Number charged	Legislation	Outcome
1	Criminal Law Act 1977 Section 1 (conspiracy to possess firearms)	4 years (and 2 years on a further charge, to run concurrently)
1	Criminal Law Act 1977 Section 1 (conspiracy to possess firearms)	Charges withdrawn (excluded under PTA)
2	Explosive Substances Act 1883 Section 1 (conspiracy to cause explosions)	Awaiting trial
5	Explosive Substances Act 1883 Section 3 (possession of explosives)	Awaiting trial
4	Criminal Law Act 1977 Section 1 (conspiracy to kidnap)	Prosecution gave no evidence. All cases dismissed. However one person was deported and one person was removed under the Immigration Act 1971.
3	Criminal Law Act 1977 Section 1 (conspiracy to commit murder)	Awaiting trial
2	Offences against the Person Act 1861 Section 1 (murder)	Awaiting trial

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were remanded in custody before trial for terrorist-type offences in 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: Nineteen such persons were remanded into custody during 1987.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in British prisons who give as their domicile Northern Ireland have been returned to Northern Ireland to serve the whole or part of their sentences in 1986 and 1987; and how many of these prisoners were serving sentences for terrorist-type offences.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In 1986 two inmates were transferred from England and Wales to Northern Ireland at their own request to serve the remainder of their sentences, and in 1987 three such transfers were made. Four of these inmates gave Northern Ireland as their domicile, and one was granted a transfer as an exception to the normal criteria in view of his strong family ties with Northern Ireland. None had been convicted of terrorist-type offences. Transfers of inmates from Scotland to Northern Ireland are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average length of custodial sentence of female prisoners in England and Wales in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. John Patten: In 1986 the average length of sentences of immediate custody imposed by the courts on female offenders was 10·2 months. Provisional estimates indicate that in 1987 the average increased to 12·3 months.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average period of custodial remand for female custodial remand prisoners in England and Wales for the years 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Information on the average time spent on remand in prison department establishments is published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales", table 2(a) of the latest issue, for 1986, Cm.210, copies of which are in the Library. Information for 1987 is not yet available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners giving as their domicile either (a) the Republic of Ireland of (b) Northern Ireland have been permitted to return home to the Republic of Ireland or Northern Ireland on parole for humanitarian reasons in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This information is not available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were transferred from (a) England and Wales to Northern Ireland and (b) Northern Ireland to England and Wales in 1987; and under which section of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 such transfers were carried out.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Three inmates were transferred from England and Wales to Northern Ireland under section 26 of the 1961 Act, and two under section 27. Three inmates were transferred from Northern Ireland to England and Wales under section 29 of the Act.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Board

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many appeals to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board are pending at the latest date;

(2) how many cases referred to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board are still pending at the latest date.

Mr. John Patten: At the end of April about 79,000 applications were awaiting resolution by the board, including about 5,900 awaiting a hearing.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the highest award made by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board to date.

Mr. John Patten: £481,400.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases have been dealt with by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board since its inception.

Mr. John Patten: The number of applications resolved between 1 August 1964 and 30 April 1988 was 379,820.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long on average it takes the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board to reply to legal representations on behalf of clients.

Mr. John Patten: The board's practice is to reply to legal representations as soon as possible. Information about the average time taken is not kept centrally by the board.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average waiting time for appeals to be heard by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board following an appeal against a decision by a single member.

Mr. John Patten: The board does not keep a central record of waiting times. The length of time between refusal of a board member's determination and a hearing varies between six and 18 months.

Mr. R. J. Driscoll

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the case of Mr. R. J. Driscoll, of Liverpool, arising from his claim to the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in December 1985, will be decided.

Mr. John Patten: As the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board is responsible for the consideration and determination of individual applications for compensation, I have asked the board to write to the hon. Member.

West Yorkshire Police (Report)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place a copy of the Byford report on the West Yorkshire police in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. As the then Home Secretary said in his statement to the House on 19 January 1982 at column 163 the report was from an inspector of constabulary to the Home Secretary and as such enjoyed, and continues to enjoy, the normal confidentiality which such reports have always had. A detailed summary of the report was place in the Library at the time.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the City of London police as to why Mr. Chris Jameson was not interviewed in the course of the recent inquiry into conflicts between the two principal Crown witnesses at the appeal of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the City of London police listing the persons interviewed in their inquiry into contacts between the two principal Crown witnesses in the recent appeal hearing of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the City of London police as to the cost of the recent inquiry into contacts between the two principal Crown witnesses at the recent appeal hearing of the six men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings;

(4) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the City of London police as to how many people were interviewed during their recent inquiry into contacts between the two principal Crown witnesses during the appeal hearing of the men convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings.

Mr. John Patten: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to his question of 19 May at column 541. The conduct of the investigation, including decisions on which persons to interview, is an operational matter and is the responsibility of the Commissioner of the Police for the City of London. I understand that no additional costs were incurred in the investigation.

Police (Civilian Staff)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the percentage civilianisation in each of the police authorities in England as a percentage of the total force in each area.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:—

Police authority force	Position at 31 March 1988 Civilians[1] as a percentage of force establishment
Avon and Somerset	21·1
Bedfordshire	23·7
Cambridgeshire	26·6

[1] The percentages in this column are based on the figures supplied by police forces of civilians whose work contributes significantly to the performance of the functions of the force. Part-time staff are included on a 2 for 1 basis.

Recidivism

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ex-prisoners of Welford road prison, Leicester, have reoffended in each year since 1980.

Mr. John Patten: The information requested is not available centrally. Reconviction rates within two years of release from sentence for all males are published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales", (table 8(a) of the latest volume, for 1986, Cm. 210) copies of which are in the Library.

DNA Report

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish his findings on the DNA report proposed by Dr. Jeffreys of Leicester university.

Mr. Renton: It is intended that copies of the report prepared by the Home Office on the pilot trial of DNA use in immigration casework, in which the DNA testing was carried out by Professor Jeffreys of Leicester university, will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses shortly.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the amendment regulations regarding residential care concessionary television licences, announced on 18 May Official Report, column 467, affect those living in accommodation for elderly and disabled people with a dedicated warden and communal facilities for the use of all occupants provided or run by private companies; what distinction is drawn between such accommodation and similar accommodation provided by local authorities and housing associations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The amendment regulations do not affect the position of sheltered housing schemes which are privately owned or run, and which continue to be ineligible for the concessionary television licence.

Racial Equality in Schools

Sir Rhodes Boyson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has reached any decision on the application by the London borough of Brent for a section 11 grant for the development programme for racial equality in schools.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: I have now received and considered the report of an inquiry which Sir David Lane carried out at my request on Brent's development programme for race equality. He is severely critical of the arrangements for the development and implementation of the programme in 1986. But he finds that, under a new director of education and on a much reduced scale, the programme has now been accepted in schools. Sir David Lane and Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools, in a parallel report also published today, find that the scheme is now making a useful contribution to tackling under achievement by ethnic minority pupils in Brent schools. He accordingly recommends that, subject to extensive undertakings by Brent and its acceptance that the scheme should be independently monitored, grant should be paid for a period of three years for a retitled programme. I accept Sir David Lane's recommendations. Copies of both reports have been placed in the Library.

Brent council has accordingly been informed that section 11 grant will be paid only on the basis of the reduced scheme and its acceptance of the undertakings and of independent monitoring. Baroness Cox has agreed to lead the monitoring panel.

I have also decided to set in hand a scrutiny of the whole basis for section 11 grant. It is time that we looked again at the criteria and procedures by which grants are made under section 11.

Immigration

Mr. Holland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give a breakdown by individual nationality of persons detained in Prison Department establishments under Immigration Act powers during 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [holding answer 19 May 1988]: Information for 1987 is not yet available; the latest information is given in the table.

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the rights and entitlements which accrue to a firearms club which is approved by his Department under the terms of the Firearms Act 1968 as against a firearms club which is not approved for the use of small bore and full bore rifles and pistols and revolvers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My reply of 9 May may have been subject to misinterpretation and has been amended as follows.

Approved clubs are eligible to be issued with a club firearm certificate at no cost. The certificate authorises the purchase and possession of firearms and ammunition for club use. Approval also enables members who do not have their own firearm certificate to possess firearms and ammunition when engaged, as members of the club, in drill or target practice. Members of those clubs which are not approved must hold a personal firearm certificate which specifies the firearms and ammunition they are entitled to possess.

TRANSPORT

Ferries Safety Steering Committee

Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the composition of the steering committee investigating the safety measures necessary for British roll-on/roll-off ferries.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has taken measures to reduce under-representation of women in the higher grades and of black and Asian staff. These measures include: women-only development training; advertising opportunities for job-share, part-time work and career breaks; using the ethnic minority press for advertising local vacancies; participating in feature articles to publicise the Department's work; taking part in schools liaison; using inner city job centres and other types of outreach work; and participating in a central training review and promotion monitoring projects.

London Airport

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on studies on the provision of a direct rail link from Heathrow to Central London, and those examining the feasibility of releasing the Perry Oaks sludge works to the airport.

Mr. David Mitchell: We expect to receive very shortly a report from our consultants, Howard Humphreys and Partners, analysing the responses to the Heathrow surface access study. This will include an assessment of the most promising proposals which have been made for new or improved public transport links between central London and the airport. Discussions continue between BAA and the Thames water authority about the possible release of the Perry Oaks site.

Trunk Roads (Repairs)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department is taking to repair holes in trunk roads.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's agents carry out regular inspections to identify potholes and other defects. Hazardous defects are repaired immediately. Other repairs are dealt with according to their priority within a planned programme of work compiled at six-monthly intervals.

Settle-Carlisle Railway

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his statement in the Official Report, column 677, 16 May, what weight he gave to the Jarvis/PLC report on the Settle-Carlisle corridor in judging the potential of the Settle-Carlisle railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: I welcome the Jarvis report, which I have studied closely. It emphasises the essentially leisure and pleasure-orinented growth potential of this line.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his statement in the Official Report, column 677, 16 May, he will define those people whom he considered will suffer hardship if the Settle-Carlisle railway close; and what assessment he has made of the effects on users of the Dales rail trains.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Transport Users Consultative Committee's report advised that there would be various types of hardship if the line closed ranging from hardship to those unable to travel on steam and charter services to hardship to local people needing to travel for essential purposes. We have considerable sympathy for the latter and are seeking the TUCC's further advice on how best to mitigate such hardship by the provision of guaranteed bus services. We shall take into account the TUCC's advice on routes and timing. We shall also take into account any new evidence on hardship before taking the final decision.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his statement of 16 May, Official Report, column 677, whether there was any implied or expressed agreement that the local authorities supporting the Settle-Carlisle line were required to provide £500,000 capital expenditure to ensure retention of the line.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Cross-Channel Ferries (Boarding Passes)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the system of boarding passes for cross-Channel ferries to ensure accurate passenger numbers is fully in place and operational; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Merchant Shipping (Passenger Boarding Cards) Regulations 1988, which apply to all United Kingdom roll-on/roll-off passenger ships of class II and II(A), entered into force on 29 February and the Merchant Shipping (Passenger Boarding Cards) (Application to non-United Kingdom Ships) Regulations 1988, which apply to foreign ships when departing from United Kingdom ports, entered into force on 1 April.

Air Safeguarding Areas

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the map of air safeguarding areas designated by the Civil Aviation Authority and circulated by it to local authorities in east London, showing the broad effect of the provisions on the permitted heights of buildings within the designated area the names of the local authorities and parliamentary constituences so effected, together with the statutory basis of the provision.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The safeguarding of areas around airports is a matter for the Civil Aviation Authority. I will draw the attention of the chairman of the authority to the hon. Member's request.

Roads

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any approach from private industry to develop new roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State reached agreement on 9 April 1987 for Dartford River Crossing Ltd. to design and build a new bridge and operate the Dartford-Thurrock crossing. In addition, as I said in my reply to my hon. Friend on 11 May at columns 162-63 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a number of ideas for privately funded infrastructure projects, including roads, particularly as a result of his letter of 28 March to firms in the finance and construction industry.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any approach from private industry to develop a rail link between London and the Channel tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Some interest has been expressed, but I have received no firm proposals.

London-Heathrow (Rail Link)

Mr. McCrindle: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any approach from private industry to develop a rail link from London to Heathrow airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department has received a number of approaches from the private sector in response to the Heathrow surface access study. We hope to make an announcement shortly.

Dartford Tunnels

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the tolls at the Dartford tunnels to be increased; how that increase will be calculated; and what the new rates are likely to be.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: If the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill currently before Parliament receives Royal Assent by 30 June, I expect that tolls at the Dartford tunnels will be increased with effect from 1 September 1988.

Clause 17 of the Bill sets a limit to the size of toll increases. The limit is calculated by applying the percentage movement in the retail prices index (RPI) between December 1985 and the base month of each year (normally June), to the toll rates in force on 1 January 1986. Tolls were last increased on 1 January 1984. The June 1988 RPI will not be known until mid-July. I expect that, on current trends, the toll rates will be as set out in the table. The rates in force on 1 January 1986 are shown in brackets.

Motorcycles	0·20	(0·20)
Cars	0·70	(0·60)
Light and medium goods vehicles	1·10	(1·00)
Coaches: Heavy goods vehicles	1·80	(1·60)

The construction of the new bridge, which the Bill would authorise, is planned to start on 1 August 1988.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Magistrates' Courts (Files)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what is the average number of files being presented to prosecutors in the magistrates' courts on a daily basis by Crown Prosecution Service area or region.

The Attorney-General: The information required to answer this question is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The following table sets out the total number of cases completed in the magistrates' courts in each area during the first three months of this year. These figures do not include committals for trial, remands (either in custody or on bail), or other applications. It would be misleading to reduce the figures to a daily average, as some courts may sit only one day a week, with a small number of cases, whilst others sit six days a week, regularly dealing with well in excess of 100 cases a day.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has to recruit more staff to the Crown Prosecution Service; and how many are currently employed.

The Attorney-General: Recruitment of non-legally qualified staff in the Crown Prosecution Service has not posed difficulties which require special attention. As far as lawyers are concerned, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on 26 April 1988 at column 95.

The staffing figures on 18 May 1988 were as follows:

	Complement	Staff in post
Lawyers	1,788	1,314·5
Non-lawyers	2,992·5	2,595·1
All staff	4,780·5	3,909·6

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General what are the current pay scales for members of the Crown Prosecution Service.

The Attorney-General: For the current pay scales of all members of the Crown Prosecution Service at grade 5 and below, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris) on 26 February 1988 at columns 353-54.

The current pay scales for staff at grades 1 to 4 are as follows:

Grade	Range £
1	65,000
2	43,500-54,000[1]
3	34,000-43,000[1]
4	30,344-33,469[1]

[1] Includes additional increment payable under the performance point scheme.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Attorney-General if he intends to raise the pay levels of members of the Crown Prosecution Service in the light of the recent internal survey by members of the staff on their pay and conditions.

The Attorney-General: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) on 26 April 1988 at column 94 and 21 April 1988 at columns 507-509.

Crime Statistics

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Attorney-General if he will give for each of the following categories of crime, namely murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to commit murder, wounding with intent to do serious bodily harm, possession of firearms or explosives with intent, possessing firearms or explosives, other major firearms offences and membership of an illegal organisation, the number of cases reported to and investigated by the Director of Public Prosecutions, the number of persons charged and the number of persons convicted who were serving members of the security forces at the time of the alleged offence in the years 1986 and 1987.

The Attorney-General: I regret that the figures requested are not kept separately by the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions. To ascertain whether the defendant in a case in any of the categories mentioned was a serving member of the security forces at the time of the alleged offence would involve checking each case individually. This could not be done without incurring disproportionate cost.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases in 1987 involving persons injured by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland have been considered by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland; and what action was taken in each case.

The Attorney-General: Between 1 January 1987 and 31 December 1987 the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland considered 19 cases involving persons injured by plastic bullets in Northern Ireland. No prosecutions were directed in 18 cases. In the remaining case, a direction pends the receipt of further information from the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Police Operations (Football Matches)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Attorney-General what was the cost to public funds of the trials associated with the police operations codenamed Own Goal, Full-time and Dirty Den in relation to alleged public order offences in connection with football matches in London.

The Attorney-General: The cost to public funds of an individual trial cannot be precisely quantified. It comprises a number of separate elements borne by different Government Departments. Most of these form part of the ordinary running costs of the Departments concerned. The only amounts which can be precisely identified are those payable to prosecuting counsel and the defence lawyers.

The fees payable to prosecuting counsel have not yet been assessed. Defence costs which are payable out of the legal aid fund are determined by an officer of the Crown court upon receipt of the lawyers' claims for fees. No such claims have yet been received.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Attorney-General how many possible prosecutions of persons for alleged offences involving football hooliganism are currently outstanding.

The Attorney-General: It is not practicable to enumerate the number of possible prosecutions of persons for alleged offences involving football hooligans which are currently outstanding. The Crown Prosecution Service does not keep separate figures for prosecutions which have been brought against persons following incidents at or in the vicinity of football matches. Such information could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Gloucester United Schools Charity

Mr. French: To ask the Attorney-General if he will request the Charity Commissioners to institute an inquiry under section 6 of the Charities Act 1960 into the affairs of the Gloucester United Schools Charity; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have no present intention of making such a request, but if my hon. Friend would care to write to me suggesting any reason why I should do so I shall consider the matter.

WALES

Homelessness

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were classified as homeless in Clwyd and Gwynedd in 1979; and what is the most recent figure.

Mr. Grist: The numbers of persons accepted as homeless in Gwynedd during 1979 and 1987 were 875 and 644 respectively, and in Clwyd 1,059 and 2,027.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the target figure for JTS in Wales in the last financial year, the total number of participants, and the underspend on appropriation.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Numerical and financial regional targets were not set when new job training schemes started in April 1987, since the pace of expansion of the scheme was to be determined by the quality of training. In Wales up to 12,040 places were contracted by managing agents in the year ending April 1988, during which 4,586 unemployed adults entered the scheme and expenditure by Manpower Services Commission was £2·069 million.

Private Clinics

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the total number of beds in private clinics in Wales.

Mr. Grist: There were 212 beds in private hospitals in Wales as at 31 December 1986, the latest year for which information is available.

In addition, there were 56 authorised pay beds in National Health Service hospitals (including two for emergency use only) as at 31 December 1986 and 1987.

Grant-related Expenditure

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total rateable value grant-related expenditure assessment from 1981-82, population, total expenditure and rateable value per head, in total, for local authorities in Wales in each year from 1979-80 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Grist: The information requested, taken from the latest rate support grant report for each year from 1981-82 to 1988-89, is given in the table. Comparable information for 1979-80 and 1980-81 is not available.

Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of local authorities which spent, respectively, above or below (a) their grant-related expenditure assessment and (b) any expenditure target set in each year from 1981-82 to 1988-89, estimate.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is given in the table. Comparisons of spending with grant-related expenditure assessments have been based on local authorities' total expenditure as defined for rate support grant purposes. The current expenditure targets set for 1981-82 have been compared with actual current expenditure reduced to allow for any spending disregards and revalued to the November 1980 rate support grant price base used for the targets. To compare spending in the years from 1982-83 to 1985-86 with total expenditure targets, actual total expenditure adjusted for disregards has been used. No expenditure targets have been set since 1985-86.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) housing starts and (b) housing completions were made in each of the housing authorities of Gwynedd and Clwyd in 1979 and for the most recent year for which figures are available; how many houses in Gwynedd and in Clwyd are estimated to be (i) in urgent need of repair, (ii) without one or more basic amenities, (iii) without an inside toilet and (iv) without a fixed bath; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The information on housing starts and completions is given in the table. In 1986 there were 11,200 dwellings in Clwyd and 14,000 in Gwynedd in serious disrepair (that is, with repair costs of £3,000 or over) and 3,800 in Clwyd and 3,700 in Gwynedd lacking one or more basic amenity. There were 1,800 dwellings in Clwyd and 1,700 in Gwynedd lacking a WC inside the dwelling and 1,600 in Clwyd and 1,800 in Gwynedd lacking a fixed bath or shower. Since 1979, some 12,076 renovation grants have been completed in Gwynedd and 7,500 completed in Clwyd.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table including the budgeted current and capital expenditure, respectively, and the forecast actual, current and capital expenditure, respectively, of each of the new district health authorities in Wales for the current year.

Mr. Grist: The resources currently available to each authority for 1988-89 are detailed in the table. These allocations will be subject to change during the course of the year as funds for centrally directed developments are released and for the extra funds which have been made available for the additional costs of this year's review bodies' awards, over and above the allowance for inflation in authorities' initial allocations. Allocations may also be subject to further adjustment in the event of authorities transferring funds from revenue to capital or vice versa or borrowing or lending funds under brokerage arrangements.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the expenditure levels forecast for each district health authority in Wales for the coming financial year, together with comparable expenditure for each of the preceding five years.

Mr. Grist: The information requested, which is expressed in cash terms for comparability with allocations in 1988-89, is as follows:

Notes:

1 The information provided relates to the actual or estimated cash spent by each authority in the period reviewed, for the years 1983-84 to 1986-87 it is taken from DHA annual accounts.

2 The figures for 1987-88 are estimates; actual figures will not be available until after 30 June when the health authorities submit their annual financial statements for 1987-88.

3 The figures provided for 1988-89 reflect current allocations. These will be subject to change in respect of funds for centrally directed developments, provision for which is currently held in central reserves, and for each authority's share of the extra money which has been made available in respect of the additional cost of this year's Review Bodies' awards over the allowance for inflation in their allocations. Authorities may also transfer funds between their revenue and capital allocations or borrow or lend funds under brokerage arrangements and such action would further effect the 1988-89 figures.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table showing the revenue expenditure of each district health authority in Wales for each year since 1979 both at 1988 and outturn prices.

Mr. Grist: The revenue expenditure of each district health authority in Wales for each year since 1979, in income and expenditure terms estimated 1988-89 prices is as follows:

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table, for 1987-88 and for each of the past 20 years, showing the total expenditure on the services provided by health authorities in Wales and their predecessors and by Gwynedd health authority and its predecessors, respectively.

Mr. Grist: The total expenditure on the services provided by health authorities in Wales for the period 1974-75[1] to 1986-87[2] is given in the table:—

Private Treatment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to amend National Health Service procedures to enable area administrators of health authorities in Wales to know the numbers of patients treated privately by doctors and specialists employed on a part-time basis by the area health authority.

Mr. Grist: No, because in this matter district general managers need ensure only that consultants on part-time contracts honour their commitments to the National Health Service.

Private Beds

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the number of private beds within National Health Service hospitals in each area health authority in Wales, the percentage occupancy of these beds and the annual income to each health authority from charges made for boarding costs for their private beds for each year since 1979.

Mr. Grist: The information is given in the table:

District Health Authorities (Transport and Travelling Grant)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each district health authority in Wales, the amount within the total grant which is provided to meet the transport and travelling needs of that authority.

Mr. Grist: District health authorities' resource allocations do not contain specific allowances for transport and travel costs. However, in the revenue formula, which is used in determining the revenue resource allocations to authorities, the ambulance component is weighted to take account of population sparsity as measured by road length per head of population. I have arranged for a copy of the 1988-89 revenue formula assessment to be placed in the Library of the House.

Tourism (Ambulance Cover)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will seek to ensure that every area health authority in Wales makes resources available to ensure increased ambulance cover in summer for those areas which receive substantial influxes of tourists.

Mr. Grist: It is the responsibility of health authorities in Wales to ensure that adequate ambulance cover is available for their resident population and, in summer months, for any increases due to the influx of tourists. Each authority organises its ambulance service accordingly.

Bilingual Health Staff

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will give the number of qualified speech therapists employed by each of the area health authorities in Wales; and how many of those currently employed are bilingual in Welsh and English;

(2) what proportion of staff in each of the area health authorities in Wales is bilingual.

Mr. Grist: The number of speech therapists employed by each of the district health authorities in Wales was given in my reply to the hon. Gentleman on 1 March 1988. Information on the number of staff employed in the National Health Service who are bilingual is not held centrally.

Psychiatric Patients

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the numbers of persons in Wales who were ordered to be held in psychiatric hospitals under provisions of Mental Health Acts during 1987 or most recent available and the number of such persons detained under orders in Wales at the current time.

Mr. Grist: The latest available figures indicate that during 1986 there were 830 admissions to mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units in Wales under the various provisions of the Mental Health Act 1983. Details are as follows:

Mental Health Act 1983 Section	Number of people
2	333
3	121
4	254
[1]37	17
[2]37	3
136	31
Other powers	68
TOTAL	830

[1]Without section 41 restriction.
[2]With section 41 restriction.

On 5 April 1987, there were 192 patients in these hospitals and units who were being detained under the Act.

Ambulances

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the number of ambulances in working condition in each of the district health authorities in Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Grist: This information is not held centrally.

Area Health Authorities (Finance Allocation)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to give further recognition in deciding on allocation of finance to area health authorities in Wales of sparsity of population, impact of tourism, and costs associated with elderly population migration.

Mr. Grist: The revenue formula, used in determining the revenue resource allocations to district health authorities in Wales, takes account of population sparsity in the ambulance component, which is weighted by road length per head of population. The formula also takes account of the seasonal pattern of activity in accident and emergency services, reflecting the effects of tourism. Each element of the formula is weighted by the age and sex structure of the population and therefore incorporates the effects of the movement of elderly migrants into authorities' areas. A copy of the 1988-89 revenue formula assessment is in the Library of the House.

The formula is kept under review by the joint NHS —Welsh Office resource allocation working group. This group is currently considering the need for and possible means of taking further account of population sparsity in the formula and will be reporting to my right hon. Friend in July.

Single European Market

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research has been undertaken by his Department into the effects on the Welsh economy of the completion of the single European market in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Completion of the single European market will bring greater freedom of trade. I have not commissioned a formal study, but research from various sources has shown that this liberalisation of trade will offer great potential benefits to all nations and regions within the European Community. The effects within Wales will, however, depend very much on the response of individual businesses to the new opportunities which the single market will present. A major programme is planned to raise the awareness of industry in Wales to the opportunities and what can be done to realise them. Currently, I am in the process of writing to all exporting companies and potential exporters known to my Department—over 3,000 companies—encouraging them to respond to the challenge and sending them advice on how to do so.

Expenditure Allocations

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money remains unallocated under each expenditure heading for Wales for 1988-89.

Mr. Peter Walker: There are many areas of spending within my responsibility where resources remain which have not yet been specifically committed or allocated. These are far too numerous to detail.

I envisage that these remaining resources will be wholly spent during the course of the current financial year in accordance with the plans which have been clearly set out in the Wales chapter of the Government's "Expenditure Plans 1988-89 to 1990-91" (Cm. 288—II) and the Supply Estimate booklet (HC 339-XVII) presented to Parliament on 15 March.

Should circumstances change, it may be necessary for me to switch some of the uncommitted resources from one expenditure heading to another. Where these changes are significant, Parliament will be notified by means of the normal cash limit and Supplementary Estimate procedures.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what allocations of resources under each expenditure heading have been made to the south Wales valleys for the current year and for each of the next two years.

Mr. Peter Walker: Most of the resources under my control are allocated to local authorities and health authorities whose areas do not correspond precisely to the valleys. Allocations are also made to agencies which operate on an all-Wales basis. Specific expenditure allocations have not therefore been made to the valleys.

Water Pollution Offences

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of prosecutions and convictions arising from water pollution offences in 1984-85, 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88, respectively, in Wales.

Mr. Grist: The Department has not instigated any prosecutions against the Welsh water authority in respect of discharges from sewage treatment works during the four years in question. Prosecution in respect of other discharges to water is the responsibility of the Welsh water authority and I have asked the chairman of the Welsh water authority to write to the hon. Gentleman.

Cash Limits

Mr. Raffan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to make any changes to the cash limits for class XVII, votes 5 and 8, for 1988-89.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the cash limit for Class XVII, Vote 5 will be increased by £1,294,000 from £223,490,000 to £224,784,000 and the cash limit for Class XVII, Vote 8 will be increased by £33,366,000 from £743,259,000 to £776,625,000.

The whole increase for Class XVII, Vote 8, together with £634,000 of the increase for Class XVII, Vote 5, follows the decision to implement the recommendations of the review bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 21 April 1988. Those increases will be charged to the reserve and do not, therefore, add to the public expenditure planning total.

A further increase of £600,000 is required for Class XVII, Vote 5 to augment the provision for the development and implementation of the education national curriculum in Wales. Provision for this service formed part of the last public expenditure survey and does not, therefore, constitute either an increase in the planning total or a claim on the reserve.

The remaining increase of £60,000 for Class XVII, Vote 5 is required to meet preliminary costs of the privatisation of the Welsh Water Authority. A corresponding reduction of £60,000 is being made to the cash limit for Class X, Vote 9 (Sale of shares in the water services public limited companies, etc.).

Civil Servants (Outside Activities)

Mr. John: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many civil servants in his Department are also directors or consultants in (a) public liability companies, (b) companies limited by guarantee, (c) building societies, (d) other friendly societies and (e) commercial undertakings other than the above; and what rules or instructions govern these activities with particular reference to remuneration.

Mr. Peter Walker [holding answer 23 May 1988]: The information is not available. The involvement of Welsh Office staff in outside occupations is covered by several staff rules, including one which requires that without permission no officer may hold a directorship or engage in consulting work which has a connection with official duties or is on behalf of a firm or concern which is in contractual or other special relationship with the Department. There is no requirement to obtain consent where the activity does not impinge on the Welsh Office.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many houses in Wales are seriously in need of repair.

Mr. Grist [holding answer 16 May 1988]: The number of dwellings in Wales in serious disrepair was 123,600 a substantial improvement over 1981, as a result of 130,210 renovation grants completed since that time.

ENVIRONMENT

Ministerial Duties

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the National Consumer Council concerning water privatisation the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: Since taking office I have had no meetings with the National Consumer Council concerning privatisation, although I have had informal discussions with one of its representatives.

I am content that, after flotation, consumers' interests will be satisfactorily served by the proposed Director General of Water Services.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the National Federation of Anglers the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I met representatives of the National Federation of Anglers on 25 February 1988, when they formed part of a delegation from the National Anglers' Council to discuss the proposed National Rivers Authority.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the National Trust the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have visited a number of National Trust properties. My noble Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water has met members of the National Trust during the last year.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Council for the Protection of Rural England the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have not attended any meetings of the Council for the Protection of Rural England in the last year. My noble Friend the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water has met members of the Council for the Protection of Rural England during the last year.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings with the Council for Environmental Conservation the Minister for Sport, the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) has attended in the course of his official duties in the last year; and if he will list them.

Mr. Moynihan: I have not attended any meetings of the Council for Environmental Conservation this year.

North Sea

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress made nationally and internationally on action agreed at the first intergovernmental conference to protect the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: Progress made nationally and internationally on action agreed at the first intergovernmental conference to protect the North sea (the Bremen conference) was reported on and reviewed by the second international conference on the protection of the North sea in London in November 1987. This is reflected in the programme of further action in many of the areas covered by the Bremen declaration which is set out in the ministerial declaration issued at the London conference, copies of which are in the Library.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the atmospheric pollutants which he believes need to be reduced, or, if appropriate, to be eliminated in order to protect the maritime environment of the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: There is great uncertainty about the quantities of atmospheric pollutants entering the North sea and therefore uncertainty in the efficacy of reducing emissions in protecting the sea from pollution. However, the United Kingdom is already committed to a precautionary policy to reduce airborne emissions, illustrated by the investment of £1 billion by CEGB on flue-gas desulphurisation and on low-NO_x burners. It also participates in the work of the Paris commission on the monitoring and deposition modelling of heavy metals and has increased its research efforts to improve our understanding of the interaction of atmospheric pollutants with the marine environment.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy towards the use of best available technology to reduce nutrients in discharges from waste water treatment plants whose effluent enters the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government are participating fully in the Paris commission working group on nutrients and in discussions in other international forums concerning nutrients discharged into marine waters. The North sea declaration calls for reduction of inputs of nutrients into areas where these are likely to cause pollution. A review of nutrient concentrations in United Kingdom estuarial and coastal waters is being carried out under the auspices of the marine pollution monitoring and management group. The Government will consider if there are specific actions needed in the light of this.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the most dangerous substances from which it is necessary to protect the North sea and for which adherence to a precautionary approach to pollution control is necessary.

Mr. Moynihan: The ministerial declaration following the second international conference on the protection of the North sea in London (copies of which are in the Library) identified substances which are persistent, toxic and liable to bioaccumulate. Annex A of the declaration lists examples of those substances which are already the subject of specific action. Annex B lists examples of other potentially significant pollutants where it was agreed to consider what further action might be taken to reduce inputs. The United Kingdom is drawing up a list of the most dangerous substances for priority action, which will be called the red list.

The United Kingdom Government has taken an early lead in implementing this part of the declaration and their proposals are set out in the guidance note on the ministerial declaration published on 3 February 1988, copies of which are also in the Library.

Phosphates

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has plans to regulate the use of phosphates in detergents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government have no plans at present to regulate the use of phosphate in detergents.

Pollution

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the uniform emission standards presently in place for all the pollutants controlled in all the rivers and estuaries under United Kingdom jurisdiction entering the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: The United Kingdom does not generally set uniform emission standards for discharges of particular substances. Under the present pollution control system for water in this country, the levels of a substance permitted in discharges may vary according to the nature and use of the receiving water, the degree of dilution available and the number of other inputs affecting the water. However, the Government have announced that they intend to introduce a requirement to use the best available technology not entailing excessive cost in relation to significant discharges of the most dangerous substances, and this would be reflected in emission standards for discharges of such substances.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the environmental quality standards presently in place for all the pollutants controlled in all the rivers and estuaries under United Kingdom jurisdiction entering the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: The following national environmental quality standards in microgrammes per litre have been set for the individual substances listed below in all United Kingdom waters:

Mercury (rivers): 1·0, (estuaries): 0·5

Cadmium (rivers): 5·0, (estuaries): 5·0

Hexachlorocyclohexane (HCH) (rivers): 0·1, (estuaries): 0·02

Lead; Chromium; Zinc; Copper; Nickel; Arsenic—The ranges of environmental quality standards for these substances are set out in Appendix 2 of Department of the Environment Circular 18/85, a copy of which is available in the Library.

National quality standards for a number of additional substances will be set in the near future.

In addition, quality standards for a range of substances and other parameters apply to waters specifically designated under or falling within the scope of the following EC directives:

76/160/EEC concerning the quality of bathing water,

78/659/EEC on the quality of fresh water needing protection or improvement in order to support fish life,

79/923/EEC on the quality required of shellfish waters,

75/440/EEC concerning the quality required of surface water intended for the abstraction of drinking water in the Member States.

The quality standards applied to these waters are those set down in the directives, copies of which are available in the Library.

Water authorities may also in some cases set local quality standards where national standards are not currently in place.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the key industrial and other sectors where he intends to achieve a reduction in aerial emissions using strict emission standards, if practicable, within the next four years; and how large a reduction he hopes to achieve.

Mr. Moynihan: Control over atmospheric emissions is effected by applying emission standards and by other mechanisms. Standards apply primarily to emissions from those industrial processes controlled by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (mainly in the fuel and power industry, production and processing of metals, non-metallic mineral production, and the chemical manufacturing industry) and to emissions from vehicles. gnhe extent to which emission standards will bring about reductions in aerial emissions of a wide range of pollutants over the next four years will depend on many different factors, but new standards for power station and vehicle emissions will result in substantial long-term reductions in air pollution.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what improvements are necessary in the scientific base and monitoring data, which exist for the North sea, to allow a more thorough assessment of its condition.

Mr. Moynihan: Improvements in the scientific base and monitoring of data were among the issues discussed at the second international conference for the protection of the North sea, and some of the areas where improvements were felt to be required are set out in annex G to the ministerial declaration, which is available in the Library. The conference also asked the Oslo and Paris commissions and ICES jointly to consider the setting up of a scientific task force to take forward this work and the United Kingdom hosted an inaugural meeting of the task force in March.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the details of the agreed criteria which have to be met to ensure that the knowledge of behaviour of pollutants in the North sea is sufficient to allow these pollutants to be continuously discharged into the North Sea.

Mr. Moynihan: The principal criterion governing the issue of discharge consents, whether for discharges to rivers and estuaries or direct to marine waters, is the need to protect the aquatic environment and to safeguard legitimate uses of water. Where environmental quality standards are set for specific substances. These are derived from the available date about the ecotoxicological effects of the substance of sensitive species, with a suitable safety factor built in. Regular monitoring also takes place to assess the effects of discharges. A major research programme is being undertaken by the United Kingdom and other countries bordering the North sea to add to our knowledge about the behaviour and impact of potential pollutants in the North sea.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action he is taking to reduce the quantity of substances that are persistent and toxic from reaching the North sea; what reduction he expects to achieve by 1995; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will detail the measures taken to reduce the inputs into the North sea of (a) mercury, (b) cadmium, (c) carbon tetrachlorides, (d) organic compounds, (e) pentachlorophenol, (f) polychlorinated camphino and (g) drins, wastes from titanitum oxide industry and oil from refineries and reception facilities; what steps will be taken to reduce them further; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: Discharges to water of these and other substances that are persistent and toxic are already subject to control under part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974. These controls are operated by the relevant pollution control authorities. In addition, some substances are subject to environmental quality standards laid down in EC directives.

Further action was agreed upon in the declaration following the second international North sea conference which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State chaired in the United Kingdom last November. The United Kingdom is taking an early lead in the implementation of the declaration. We have opened discussions with the water industry on the measures to be taken in order to achieve a substantial reduction (of the order of 50 per cent.) by 1995, in total inputs to the North sea, of substances that are toxic, persistent and liable to bioaccumulate. Such measures will be applied consistently throughout all United Kingdom coastal waters.

The United Kingdom's reduction programme will forcus on a priority list of the most dangerous substances, selected on the basis of strict scientific criteria, to be termed the red list. Substances on this list will be subject to stringent controls under the new unified approach to the control of dangerous substances which I announced on 18 November. The detailed proposals will be set out in a forthcoming consultation paper.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what alternative plans he has for the incineration of waste currently incinerated at sea.

Mr. Moynihan: The United Kingdom accounts for a very small proportion of the total waste incinerated in the North sea. In 1986, the last year for which comparable figures are available, the United Kingdom accounted for 3,754 tonnes or about 3·2 per cent. of the total. This amounts to only 5 per cent. of the total waste incinerated on land, but for logistical and local nuisance reasons marine incineration is currently the preferred option for these wastes. As indicated in paragraph 30 of the guidance note on the ministerial declaration following the second international North sea conference, the licensing authorities, advised by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, will seek reductions in the use of this option where practicable and seek to ensure that adequate alternative disposal capacity is available by the end of 1994.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has plans to issue advice on the action required by regulatory authorities and companies to follow up the declaration agreed at the end of the second intergovernmental conference on the North sea.

Mr. Moynihan: Follow-up action by regulatory authorities, industrial interests and others to implement the ministerial declaration following the second international conference on the North sea is the subject of a guidance note on the ministerial declaration issued by the Department on 3 February. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to whether pollution from the United Kingdom has contributed to the ecological deterioration of the Wadden sea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: None of the assessments or models so far used in North sea studies indicate that discharges from United Kingdom rivers are serious factors in the condition of the Wadden sea or other contaminated areas on the eastern side of the North sea. The main sources of pollution of these waters are the major load bearing continental rivers.

Houses of Parliament (Legionella)

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what checks have been made recently for the presence of Legionella in the water systems of the Houses of Parliament; and what were the results.

Mr. Chope: I will write to my hon. Friend.

Ports (Oils and Chemicals)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how often he reviews the availability, capacity and standards of service of oil and chemical reception facilities operating at British ports.

Mr. Moynihan: Legislation requiring ports and terminals to provide reception facilities for oil residues came into force in July 1984 and the availability and capacity of these facilities have since been assessed annually by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. In the case of other noxious residues, including chemicals, legislation was enacted in April 1987 and the same monitoring arrangements are being put into place. There have been no reports of inadequate standards of service, but if such a report were received, it would of course be investigated.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Heddle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the initiatives his Department is taking to assist the disabled with their house adaptations.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities give grants of £40 million each year for the adaptation of houses for disabled people. My Department has published today a manual which will provide practical advice for all those engaged in this work. Copies have been sent to all housing, social services and health authorities in England and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is taking similar action. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Local Government Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will take steps to ensure that new entrants to the local government superannuation scheme should be treated as members unless they elect to the contrary; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what resources are available in the local government superannuation scheme to make improvements, including pensions for widowers, children of married women, dependants of single persons, spouses of post-retirement marriages, and a guaranteed pension for five years as well as a minimum death-in-service lump sum of two years' pay; and what the total cost would be of these improvements on top of current liabilities;

(3) what plans he has to terminate the difference in the local government superannuation scheme whereby women contributors pay into the scheme at the same rate as men for unequal benefit;

(4) why women receive less than their male counterparts when paying into the local government superannuation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I will write to the hon. Member.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he has taken to remedy past inequalities in employment practices in his Department, in compliance with the codes of the Commission for Racial Equality and the Equal Opportunities Commission, respectively.

Mr. Ridley: My Department has taken measures to reduce under-representation of women in the higher grades and of black and Asian staff. These measures include women-only development training; advertising opportunities for job-share, part-time work and career breaks; using the ethnic minority press for advertising local vacancies; participating in feature articles to publicise the Department's work; taking part in schools liaison; using inner city job centres and other types of outreach work; and participating in a central training review and promotion monitoring projects.

Somerset Wetlands (SSSI)

Mr. Ashdown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how long he estimates the site of special scientific interest in the Somerset wetlands will continue to qualify as such, at current rates of drying out; and whether he will introduce a system of water table management, aimed at preserving the levels, and moors, wetland status.

Mr. Moynihan: The results of recent surveys commissioned by the NCC into the possible lowering of water levels and a decline in the density of breeding wading birds on the Somerset levels and moors over the last 10 years are currently under examination. The NCC has no plans at present to denotify any of the SSSIs. It has recently met Wessex water authority to discuss the position and will be having further consultations with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, Wessex water authority, internal drainage boards, other environmental interests and farming representatives.

Rating Reform

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether community charge officers will be able to ask for information concerning an individual from gas, water and electricity boards; and whether those boards could exchange information about individuals to the community charge officer.

Mr. Howard: No. The powers of community charge registration officers to request information are set out in schedule 2 to the Local Government Finance Bill. They do not include power to request information from the bodies mentioned. Nor will registration officers have any power to pass information to those bodies.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why Price Waterhouse was chosen to carry out a study concerning the costs of implementing the community charge; how many companies tendered for the study; and why the actual cost of implementing the community charge in Scotland was not used as a basis for a reliable estimate as to the likely true cost of introducing the legislation in England and Wales.

Mr. Howard: The actual cost of preparing for and implementing rates reform in Scotland will not be known until after April 1989. Our estimates of these costs in England and Wales have been questioned by local authority associations and some individual authorities have made their own forecasts. Price Waterhouse was selected to undertake an independent study of these costs after we had examined tenders and written proposals from six firms of consultants.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment why, pursuant to the answer of 16 May, the information requested relating to illustrative community charges for 1988-89 was given by reference to figures for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Because estimates for 1988-89 are not yet available for England. I apologise for not making that clear.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from Community Service Volunteers with regard to exemption from the community charge; what reply he is sending; what action he will be taking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have received a number of such representations from various organisations. This matter was also discussed during the consideration of the Local Government Finance Bill in Committee in another place. My noble Friend the Minister of State agreed to consider the possibility of making special provision for residential voluntary workers.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what percentage of single pensioners he estimates will be adversely affected by the introduction of the community charge;

(2) what percentage of pensioners he estimates will be adversely affected by the community charge.

Mr. Howard: I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Local Government (Wage Earners)

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many wage earners currently make no direct contribution towards the cost of local government.

Mr. Howard: On the basis of data contained in the family expenditure survey, I estimate that about 10 million wage earners currently do not receive rate bills.

European Directives

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the proposed European directives that he has vetoed in the Council of Ministers since 1979.

Mr. Moynihan: The Council does not keep records of votes on a national basis. The information requested is therefore not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Wetlands (Ramar Convention)

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) pursuant to his reply of 11 May, Official Report, column 128, whether he will make it his policy that sites meeting the revised criteria and guidelines for the identification of wetlands of international importance under the Ramsar convention should be listed under article 2 of the convention;

(2) pursuant to his reply of 11 May, Official Report column 127, whether he will make it his policy that sites confirmed by the Nature Conservancy Council as qualifying for designation as special protection areas under EC directive 79/409 or wetlands of international importance under the Ramsar convention should be so designated.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government consider the formal classification under the Ramsar convention and/or the EC birds directive of all sites which the Nature Conservancy Council concludes meet the relevant criteria when the necessary preparatory work is completed. Our aim is to designate those sites which are necessary to meet the conservation objectives of the convention and the directive.

Housing Stock

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to implement a detailed inventory of the existing housing stock with estimates of replacement costs.

Mrs. Roe: No.

Cross-Bradford Rail Link

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the reasons given by the Property Services Agency why a cross-Bradford rail link could not be accommodated on the proposed Bradford courthouse site; and if he will make a statement

Mr. Chope: A cross-Bradford rail link could not be accommodated on the proposed Bradford courthouse site because its closeness to the courthouse would produce unacceptable levels of noise and vibration, would create unsurmountable security problems, and would be visually intrusive.

Water Environment

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has amended his plans, in the event of privatisation of the water authorities, for the legal framework protecting the water environment.

Mr. Moynihan: No. It remains the Government's firm intention to strengthen protection of the water environment, in particular by providing a statutory framework of quality objectives and standards for rivers and estuaries; and by establishing the National Rivers Authority, for the management and protection of the water environment. Detailed provisions will be brought forward in the forthcoming water privatisation Bill.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the name of the main contractors for any development, including infrastructure and building works, for each site sold by the London Docklands Development Corporation since July 1981.

Mr. Trippier: Appointment of contractors by developers of sites sold by the LDDC is a matter for the developers.

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give the name of the main contractor, the value of the contract and the date when the contract was signed for each site where the London Docklands Development Corporation has let a contract for infrastructure works, including land reclamation and the provision of drainage or other services, since July 1981;

(2) if he will name the purchaser for each site sold by the London Dockland Development Corporation since July 1981.

Mr. Trippier: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of any letter written to the London Docklands Development Corporation by Messrs Robson Rhodes concerning the annual accounts of the corporation, together with any respective responses which have been made.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 2 March 1988, c. 579]: The Department has examined the management letter sent by Messrs Robson Rhodes in relation to the LDDC's 1985/86 external audit, and the corporation's response and has consulted Messrs Robson Rhodes and officers of the corporation on both. Having considered the results of these consultations carefully I have reached the following conclusions:

(i) Management letters, which are the formal means by which external auditors draw the attention of the audited body to various aspects of that body's systems of internal control, do not deal with matters of substance which materially affect the annual accounts. Such matters are properly dealt with by qualification of the accounts. Robson Rhodes made it clear that none of the issues raised in its letter was of such substance in relation to the 1985/86 accounts.

(ii) None of the issues raised in the management letter alleged or implied irregularity or impropriety by the corporation, or misuse of public funds.

(iii) The auditors accept that the corporation's use of financing mechanisms was not improper or irregular. They pointed out, however, that such mechanisms are generally complex, somewhat open to misinterpretation and if multiplied in future years could increasingly press against the legal constraints by which the corporation is bound. Such timely advice is one of the purposes and benefits of external audit.

(iv) On consultancy appointments, I am satisifed that LDDC has in fact operated within the current guidelines laid down by the Department for ensuring proper competition. Robson Rhodes' main concern was that, under the internal approval procedures for appointment of consultants, full documentary evidence of the competitive process that had been carried out was not always immediately available to those ratifying appointments. LDDC has made it clear, however, that such evidence was always available for inspection, and has agreed to review supporting documentation more thoroughly.

(v) Where the award of a consultancy contract is based on a comparison of competitive rates (as distinct from the submission of tenders) there should be a full and explicit definition of the criteria used for selection. The Department will discuss this further with LDDC, and agree revised procedures as necessary.

(vi) Proper procedures were employed by LDDC in awarding consultancy appointments to three former employees of the corporation. In view of the comments made by Messrs Robson Rhodes, however, the corporation accepts that additional arrangements are required to fully demonstrate propriety in all such cases. The corporation has therefore reviewed its procedures, and now requires that all such cases should go to the board for approval.

(vii) Messrs Robson Rhodes suggested that the corporation should obtain clarification from the Department on competition requirements and how they should best be satisfied. My officials are reviewing the existing guidance to the corporation on this and will bring forward revised proposals.

(viii) The other issues raised in the management letter related to negotiated land disposals, reporting and seeking approval for project overspends, and actioning internal and external audit recommendations. I am satisfied that LDDC has taken appropriate follow-up action in each case and, where necessary, has revised and strengthened its procedures.

My Department's primary concern is that the LDDC should always respond fully and effectively to the matters raised in management letters. These letters are intended to raise issues which require detailed consideration by the body under audit and the Department and to lead to agreement on ways in which procedures could be further improved or adjusted to meet changing circumstances. But I should add that the unauthorised disclosure of such letters undermines their effectiveness for this purpose.

I am satisfied that in relation to the 1985-86 letter that the corporation has paid proper attention to the issues raised, and that a full and effective response has been made.

Youth Projects (Kensington)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those youth projects in existence in the Kensington parliamentary constituency for each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: My Department does not keep comprehensive information on youth projects in Kensington or any other area. A number of projects in Kensington aimed at benefiting young people have been supported by my Department through the urban programme in the past five years. These are listed as follows.

Royal Borough of Kensington and Chelsea Youth projects supported through the Urban Programme 1983-88.
YTS Training Centre
Construction of new training centre for borough wide youth training scheme.
Glissando Steel Orchestra
To build a sound-proofed rehearsal centre for orchestra.
Outward Bound Courses
12 Outward Bound places on courses.
Cremorne Riverside Centre
Training centre for water based activities.
St. Stephen's Intermediate Treatment Centre
Centre for the prevention and treatment of delinquency.
North Kensington Family Centre
Family centre with a Caribbean focus.
North Kensington Students Hostel Ltd.
Accommodation for homeless students.
Unemployed Centre (Venture Community Association)
Drop in centre for the unemployed.
Holiday Projects
Provision of play projects during the school summer holidays.
Stopgap
Holiday project.
Unity Association Hostel
Accommodation and support for young people.
Tabernacle Community Association Ltd.
Community Centre.
Harvey IT/Education Centre.

Water Pollution Offences

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what were the numbers of prosecutions and convictions arising from water pollution offences in each English water authority during 1984-85, 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: No prosecutions have so far been taken out against water authorities by the Department. The number of prosecutions for water pollution offences taken by each English water authority during 1984-85 and 1985-86 were:

	1984-85[1]	1985-86[1]
Anglian	17	14
Northumbrian	2	1
North West	70	26
Severn Trent	23	33
Southern	15	6
South West	12	34
Thames	5	12
Wessex	29	38
Yorkshire	33	40
Totals	206	204

[1] Some data is for calendar year.

Details for 1987 are not yet available but will be published later in the year.

Information about convictions following prosecutions is collected by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department but is not collected in a comparable form. I understand, however, that in general over 90 per cent. of these cases result in convictions.

Decisions on whether or not to prosecute rest with water authorities and will depend upon factors such as the severity of the pollution and whether the source can be clearly identified.

Berne Convention

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in which way the United Kingdom representative voted at the sixth meeting of the standing committee of the Berne convention in Strasbourg when considering the proposal to include Lululla arborea in appendix II of the convention; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government accepted the Nature Consevancy Council's advice to support the listing of the Lululla arborea in appendix II to the Berne convention. However, the species is already listed in annex I of the birds directive (79/409 EEC) and therefore comes within Community competence. I understand that, following consultations with all members states at the sixth meeting of the standing committee to the Berne convention, the Commission abstained from voting on the proposal to include the Lululla arborea in appendix II.

Dover Castle (Officers' Mess)

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when the officers' mess in Dover castle was last used; and for what purpose;

(2) on how many occasions (a) he, (b) his officials and (c) English Heritage have had discussions with interested parties in the last 12 months concerning proposals to bring the officers' mess in Dover castle back into commercial use;

(3) whether he will review the progress being made by English Heritage in processing proposals for developing the officers' mess in Dover castle; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what assistance his Department is prepared to give to English Heritage and Dover district council in order to assist private proposals for bringing the officers' mess in Dover castle into commercial use;

(5) when his officials last discussed with English Heritage proposals for developing and using the officers' mess in Dover castle; and what specifically they discussed.

Mr. Moynihan: The management, presentation and future development of Dover castle are matters for English Heritage. The former officers' mess ceased to be used for that purpose some years before the castle was placed in the care of the Ministry of Public Building and Works in 1965. It has remained empty ever since. Various proposals have been considered at different times for its re-use and I understand that English Heritage has had discussions with several potential developers. At English Heritage's request last March, my officials offered informal advice on a question of tendering procedure. Apart from that, the Department has had no discussions with English Heritage or any other party about the future use of the officers' mess building since the transfer of responsibility to English Heritage on 1 April 1984. I am sure the chairman will be happy to provide my hon. Friend with further details of his plans.

Water Industry Privatisation

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers are being currently proposed for him with regard to the setting of initial water quality standards prior to the privatisation of the water industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: In its 1986 consultation paper, "The Water Environment; The Next Steps", the Government indicated:

"In order to launch [the new Statutory Quality Objective System] on a firmly established clear basis, the Government proposes to use initially the objectives which the Water Authorities have adopted. These objectives are widely understood, have been the subject of local consultation, and can be related to the classifications used as a basis for water quality measurement in the [1980 and 1985] River Quality Surveys. Using them at the outset will ensure continuity and provide a good basis for comparison between progress in different . . . areas, and between the present situation and any future review".

This remains the Government's position. Legislation to give effect to it will be brought before Parliament in due course.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether it is intended to make provision for water protection zones following the privatisation of the water industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: It remains the Government's intention to re-enact and simplify the existing legislative provisions relating to water protection zones in the forthcoming water privatisation Bill.

National Rivers Authority Advisory Committee (Chairman)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how widely the vacancy for the position of chairman of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee was advertised; and how many applicants were considered.

Mr. Moynihan: The position of chairman of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee was not advertised. But a number of candidates were considered before the decision was taken to appoint my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Crickhowell.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what expenses the chairman of the national rivers authority advisory committee will be eligible to claim.

Mr. Moynihan: As chairman of the National Rivers Authority advisory committee, my right hon. and noble Friend, Lord Crickhowell, will be eligible to claim current Civil Service class I travelling and subsistence allowances.

Local Authorities (Investments)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) of 3 December, Official Report, column 642, what progress he has made in consideration of options to control further the investment of local government pension fund moneys in the light of the failure of the News on Sunday newspaper.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is still considering the matter and will be consulting representatives of local government and others in due course.

Planning Enforcement Notice Appeals

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the report of the efficiency scrutiny of his Department's handling of planning enforcement notice appeals, carried out in 1987, and his response to the report's recommendations.

Mr. Waldegrave: A volume incorporating the report and the action plan which we have agreed is being published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The scrutiny examined the procedures under which local planning authorities issue planning enforcement notices and the Department deals with appeals to my right hon. Friend against such notices. The report makes 51 recommendations for more efficient and effective handling of these appeals.

We have accepted many of the report's key recommendations and one of the main objectives of the action plan will be to ensure that the majority of enforcement appeals decided by planning inspectors are eventually processed, and the decision issued, within 22 weeks from receipt of the appeal.

Some of the recommendations involve proposals to amend provisions in part V of the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and to adapt existing administrative procedures for processing enforcement appeals. My Department will shortly be consulting the local authority associations, and the professional and other organisations with an interest in the planning control process, about the feasibility of implementing these recommendations.

We have also said that we shall now be undertaking urgently a full review of the enforcement powers available to local planning authorities. This review will build on the detailed analysis in the enforcement scrutiny report.

Spent Magnox Fuel

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the studies recommended by the Select Committee on the Environment on dry storage and direct disposal of spent Magnox fuel have been completed.

Mr. Moynihan: The reports and an independent review have today been deposited in the Library of the House of Commons and with the British Library. Copies have been sent to members of the Environment Committee and to other interested organisations.

The reports and the review confirm that a change to a strategy of long-term storage and direct disposal of spent Magnox fuel would not give rise to significant reductions in radiation exposures to the public or to the work force in the nuclear industry, and uncertainties would remain about the suitability of the chemically reactive fuel for direct disposal. At this late stage in the life of Magnox power stations the extra costs which would be entailed cannot, therefore, be justified. A continuation of fuel reprocessing to the end of the Magnox programme remains prudent policy.

Discharges of radioactivity from fuel reprocessing at Sellafield have been considerably reduced; they are now only one tenth of the level in 1978. Further reductions are planned from about 1991 when the enhanced actinide removal plant (EARP) becomes operational. This should enable discharges to alpha emitters to be reduced further.

The length of time for which the Magnox programme continues will depend on financial considerations, the reviews of safety of the reactors and the fuel reprocessing plant, waste management and energy strategy considerations.

Water Privatisation

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has taken any steps to prevent water authorities from acquiring stocks in statutory water companies in anticipation of the privatisation of the industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan [holding answer 23 May 1988]: It is in the first instance for the water authorities to decide in the light of the facts and circumstances of each case whether they have the legal powers and the resources to acquire water company shares.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what surveys have taken place as to the number of people who sleep rough in London each night; when such surveys were conducted; and what was the number of people found to be sleeping rough.

Mrs. Currie: I have been asked to reply.

I am not aware of any more recent official survey than the one in 1965 by the National Assistance Board which found that there were then approximately 275 people sleeping rough in London. There are extreme methodological difficulties in counting accurately the number of people sleeping rough because of their constant mobility and lack of willingness to respond to official inquiries.

EMPLOYMENT

ILO Convention 45

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether the Government has reached any decision with regard to the current opportunity to denounce International Labour Organisation (ILO) convention 45 as mentioned in his Department's recent consultative document.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government are considering carefully the many responses to the consultative document on restrictions on employment of young people and the removal of sex discrimination in legislation, including these of the CBI and TUC.

A clear majority of the responses favoured changes to many aspects of the legislation. In order to clear the way for possible changes to the statutory restrictions on women in mining which could not take place within the constraints of the convention, the Government propose to denounce ILO convention 45. Denunciation will take effect 12 months after the date on which it is registered with the ILO.

Remploy

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to ensure that Remploy pays rates of pay to its workers consistent with the standard rates of pay for the work undertaken and rates of pay for jobs considered to be of similar value; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Within a framework of wider public spending considerations, it is for the board of Remploy to determine wage rates for the company's workers. I am pleased to say that Remploy's manual work force has now voted by a sizeable majority to accept the pay offer which the board put to it recently.

Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what estimates he has as to the likely number of retirements from the dock labour scheme in each year until 1995 and the number of new entrants who will be required in each year until 1995.

Mr. Nicholls: It is not possible to make such estimates since the numbers will depend upon the choices of individuals and a variety of commercial and other factors.

Job Release Scheme

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people in each year have taken advantage of the job release scheme since its inception.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is set out in the table:

	Number
1976-77	9,979
1977-78	14,529
1978-79	25,643
1979-80	68,164
1980-81	24,239
1981-82	38,674
1982-83	46,134
1983-84	44,045
1984-85	14,895
1985-86	11,960
1986-87	12,046
1987-88	10,005

Perivale Skillcentre

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to secure the future of the Perivale skillcentre; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a review of the skills training agency at the end of last year and has received an initial report which he is considering.

Penlee Quarry

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, South, Official Report, column 285, 13 May, what was the date of the last visit to Penlee quarry by a mines and quarry inspector prior to 28 January 1987; whether the inspector was satisfied that all troughed belt conveyors at the quarry were to the British Standard; and whether the 1974 British Standard for machinery guards was required, reached or imposed.

Mr. Nicholls: The date of the last visit to Penlee quarry by a mines and quarries inspector prior to 28 January 1987 was on 5 January 1987. This visit was to deal with a matter relating to the security of stockpiles. The inspector did not deal with any other matters during that visit.

Quarries (Investigations)

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library (a) a copy of the Health and Safety Executive metallurgical laboratory report on the broken derricking pawl shaft boss from the Anderson and Grice 15-tonne Scotch derrick crane at Hantergantick quarry, St. Bernard and (b) a copy of the investigation report into the accident at Penlee quarry, Newlyn, on 28 January 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: No. The Health and Safety Executive is still considering whether or not to instigate proceedings following the Hantergantick accident. Individual accident investigation reports, which may contain personal information and opinion, are not usually made public.

Scotch Derrick Cranes

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will place in the Library a list of all scotch derrick cranes in use and their location and age so far as is known in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive does not hold a list of all Scotch derrick cranes currently in use in the United Kingdom. A list of all those cranes known to be located at quarries has been placed in the Library.

Mines and Quarries Inspectorate

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what training individual inspectors in the mines and quarries inspectorate have received to enable them to prepare all the necessary documents for a prosecution to be taken on indictment in the Crown court.

Mr. Nicholls: As a result of a comprehensive training programme, all inspectors of the mines and quarries inspectorate have the necessary knowledge and skills to prepare the documentation for consideration for prosecution.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when the next meeting is to take place between the Health and Safety Executive and the Chief Inspector of Mines and Quarries to review progress in reducing the number of fatal and serious accidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: When the chief inspector saw the executive on 23 March, he described a number of measures already in train to improve health and safety in quarries, and they were discussed. The measures in train are the responsibility of the chief inspector and need time to develop before a meeting to review progress could be useful.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prohibition and improvement notices have been issued by the Mines and Quarries Inspectorate; and how many prosecutions there are now pending following the meeting in April between Dr. Mike Jones and the health and safety executive.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is listed for the period 14 April 1988 to 20 May 1988.

	Number
Improvement Notices issued	13
Deferred Prohibition Notices issued	9
Immediate Prohibition Notices issued	30
Prosecutions Pending	2

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will introduce legislation to transfer the duty to prosecute under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 from the mines and quarries inspectorate to the Crown Prosecution Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no need to change the existing arrangements since the Director of Public Prosecutions in England and Wales and the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland can already initiate proceedings in respect of contraventions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act.

Escalators

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what consideration he has given to making regulations under section 15 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 to impose requirements with respect to the construction, maintenance and examination of escalators similar to those contained in Offices, Shops and Railway Premises (Hoists and Lifts) Regulations 1968 (S.I., 1968, No. 849).

Mr. Nicholls: I have received no such proposal from the Health and Safety Commission. I am not aware of any reason to take a substantially different view from that taken by my predecessor in replying to the Adjournment debate held on 23 December 1981 at column 1043.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will discuss with the Health and Safety Executive the case for revising its guidance notes relating to escalators with respect to (a) uniformity in the siting, size and content of escalator warning notices and (b) the fitting of stand-off skirt guards or other deflector devices to all existing escalators to minimise trapping accidents.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive will review its guidance note "Safety in the use of escalators" when it has received a report on research which is being undertaken on their behalf by the Institute for Consumer Ergonomics and which includes (a) an appraisal of escalator warning signs and (b) an evaluation of deflector devices on escalators in shopping centres and department stores.

Ceramic Industry

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people are employed in the ceramic industry at present; and how many have been employed in that industry over each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Lee: The available information is as follows:

Employees in Employment in the Refractory and Ceramic Goods industry in Great Britain (Group 248 of the Standard Industrial Classification 1980)

Thousands

December of each year	Number
1978	75·1
1979	72·2
1980	66·2
1981	58·8
1982	56·6
1983	59·1
1984	64·2
1985	67·4
1986	68·5
[1]1987	70·0

[1]The latest date for which figures are available.

These estimates are subject to considerable potential estimation error due to the relatively small number of employees in the industry.

Separate estimates for the ceramic goods industry are not available.

MSC (Grants)

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects the Manpower Services Commission to finalise supplementary grant levels to local Manpower Services Commission areas; and whether inner city areas will receive a higher level of supplementary grant to take account of the cost of premises and salaries.

Mr. Cope: The Training Commission (formerly the Manpower Services Commission) is currently in the process of determining the distribution of training places and supplementary grants to its areas. I expect the process to be completed shortly. The grants are intended to meet the higher costs of training provision associated with a wide variety of need, including the special need of the inner cities.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the total number of people under the age of 25 years who are unemployed in the Kensington constituency (a) as a percentage of all people under the age of 25 years and (b) as a percentage of the total number of unemployed people in the constituency;

(2) how many people under the ages of (a) 23 years and (b) 25 years have been unemployed in Kensington for (i) less than six months, (ii) between six months and one year, (iii) between one year and two years and (iv) over two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the number of unemployed claimants under 25 years in Kensington constituency on 14 April 1988 for the requested durations, together with the under 25 years unemployment level expressed as a percentage of the total unemployed in the constituency. Separate figures are not available for those aged under 23. Data are not available on the number of people in Kensington aged under 25.

Unemployed claimants, Kensington constituency, April 1988

	Under 25 years	Under 25 as a percentage of total unemployed Per cent.
Less than six months	503	—
Six to twelve months	216	—
One to two years	120	—
Over two years	149	—
All durations	988	23.8

YTS (Kensington)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the numbers of young people who have obtained full-time jobs on leaving YTS schemes in the Kensington constituency for each of the past three years; and what percentage this is of all those who have completed YTS schemes during that period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: Figures for the Kensington constituency are not available. The table gives details of leavers from YTS schemes in the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea and nationally. The figures have been obtained from the 100 per cent. postal follow-up surveys of young people three months after leaving YTS schemes.

	Per cent. in full time work Kensington and Chelsea	Per cent. in full-time work Great Britain
April 1985 to March 1986	53	53
April 1986 to March 1987	63	60
April 1987 to December 1987	56	51

In Kensington and Chelsea, as in the country as a whole, large numbers of trainees also leave YTS for further education and training.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have been on YTS schemes in the Kensington parliamentary constituency for each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: The number of people who have been on YTS schemes in the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea for the past three years is:

	Number
1985-86	30
1986-87	102
1987-88	154

I am pleased to see that an increasing number of young people are entering work via a structured training programme in this area.

Construction Industry (Deaths)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) deaths (b) serious and major injuries and (c) employees there were in (i) the public and (ii) the private construction industries for each year from 1970 to 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on Monday 18 April 1988, at column 317.

Stallite Batteries

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will itemise the number and year of each visit the number, type and year of each notice, and the offence by year and resultant fine with regard to Health and Safety Executive action at Stallite Batteries, Worsborough Dale, Barnsley in each of the years from 1958 to 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: The following table shows the number and year of visits to Stallite Batteries, Worsborough Dale, Barnsley, from 1965 to 1986. During 1986 the company moved to new premises in Bolton-on-Dearne.

Year	Number of visits
1965	5
1966	4
1967	3
1968	4
1969	3
1970	1
1971	16
1972	13
1973	4
1974	25
1975	14
1976	12

1981	11
1982	4
1983	5
1984	4
1985	18
1986	17

The factory was not known to Her Majesty's factory inspectorate, now part of the Health and Safety Executive, prior to 1965.

The following enforcement notices were served during the same period.

Year	Number of notices issued
1975	1 Prohibition notice 1 Improvement notice
1978	2 Improvement notices 1 Prohibition notice
1981	2 Improvement notices
1982	1 Improvement notice
1983	2 Improvement notices
1985	1 Improvement notice

Prosecutions by year with resultant fines are as follows:

Year and Offence	Total fine £
1965
Failure to notify occupation and illegal employment on a lead process:	21-18-0
1973
Failure to control fumes and failure to have an employee medically examined.	100
1988 (offence in 1986)
Failure to suspend person who was issued with a certificate of unfitness for work with lead.	750

Building Sites (London)

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions in connection with construction sites there were in London in 1987; how many offences were committed; and what was the fine for each offence.

Mr. Nicholls: The table shows the available information.

The number of prosecutions [1]: informations laid in 1986-87 [2]	The number of convictions	The average penalty per conviction £
53[3]	39	810

[1] Data are for construction related prosecutions taken by Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates of the Health and Safety Executive London area offices. They exclude any that may have been taken by other enforcing authorities.

[2] Provisional data for the 12 month period April 1986 to March 1987.

[3] The outcome of eight of these informations laid is not yet known.

Building Sites

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many prosecutions in connection with construction sites there were in 1987; what regulations were broken; and what was the fine for each offence.

Mr. Nicholls: The table shows the available information, concerning prosecutions associated with the construction industry.

Regulation	The number of prosecutions [1]: informations laid in 1986-87 [2]	The number of convictions	The average penalty per conviction £
Construction (General Provisions) Regs 1961	52	44	792
Construction (Lifting Operations) Regs 1961	40	27	649
Construction (Working Places) Regs 1966	181	145	347
Construction (Health and Welfare) Regs 1966	11	8	288
Other Regulations [3]	112	92	325
Specific Regulations not Quoted	254	166	688
Grand Total	[4]650	482	517

[1] Data are for construction related prosecutions taken by Factory and Agricultural Inspectorates of the Health and Safety Executive London area offices. They exclude any that may have been taken by other enforcing authorities.
[2] Provisional data for the 12 month period April 1986 to March 1987.
[3] Information separately distinguishing each of the other regulations can only be obtained at disproportionate cost.
[4] The outcome of 29 of these informations laid is not yet known.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how frequently the average building site has been inspected, each year, in each of the years from 1970 to 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what were (a) the estimated number of building sites and (b) the number of construction Health and Safety Executive inspectors for each of the years from 1970 to 1987.

Mr. Nicholls: The Health and Safety Executive does not keep estimates of the number of building sites. All inspectors in the factory inspectorate division of the HSE may work in construction groups. The number of experienced inspectors employed on construction work for the years as at 1 January 1979-86 was as follows:

	Number
1979	86
1980	87
1981	90
1982	89
1983	88
1984	88
1985	86
1986	84·5

In September 1987 there were 92 qualified inspectors employed on construction work.

No information is available centrally for the years 1970-78.

Sellafield (Safety Allegations)

Dr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will arrange for independent interviews and investigations to be carried out into recent allegations by employees of BNFL of safety breaches at Sellafield.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that various anonymous allegations have been made of breaches in safety rules in certain buildings at BNFL's Sellafield site. BNFL and the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate will both be looking into these allegations and undertaking any further necessary investigations.

DEFENCE

Small Firms (Research Information)

Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in making available the results of research sponsored by his Department to small firms.

Mr. Sainsbury: We attach high importance to the fullest possible exploitation of research carried out by, or on behalf of, the Ministry of Defence. Defence Technology Enterprises Limited is specifically charged with the commercial exploitation of this research and now has some 265 members, mostly in the small firms sector. The defence research information centre also plays a very important role.

Tucano

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest cost estimate for the Tucano trainer project; what were the original estimates; when the trainers are expected to be in operation; what was the original estimate; what financial and operational contingency plans have been made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The estimated cost for the Tucano trainer project has not changed since the contract was let. Aircraft were ordered on a firm price basis, with payment to be made on delivery. Consequently, there is no increase in the contract price as a result of delays in the programme. The value of the contract is, however, commercially confidential. We expect deliveries of Tucano to the RAF to commence shortly. Deliveries were initially scheduled to begin in January 1987. As a result of the delay, the RAF's Jet Provost fleet is continuing in service for longer than originally planned.

Radar Station (Bradwell)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on the role and function of the trial radar station near Bradwell-on-Sea, Essex; which unit or agency is responsible for operating this installation and its experiments; what is the estimated cost of the activities at this location; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: As I have already explained in my reply to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) on 29 April, the facility is used for high-frequency surface wave radar technology studies. The site is managed by Marconi Radar Systems Ltd. and has been sub-let to the Royal Signals Research Establishment (amongst other users) to undertake research work. They are paying a proportional element of the total maintenance costs of the site currently estimated to be about £70,000 a year, together with costs of dedicated Marconi personnel incurred in supporting these studies.

Tornado

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force Tornados have been destroyed or seriously damaged in a flying accident since the Tornado entered Royal Air Force service; in which countries they occurred; how many were on low-flying exercises; how many lives have been lost; and what has been the cost of the Tornados involved.

Mr. Freeman: Since entering service with the Royal Air Force, 17 major Tornado accidents have resulted in 15 aircraft being lost and a further three sustaining major damage. In these accidents, six aircrew were killed. Eleven of the accidents occurred in the United Kingdom or surrounding waters, four took place in the Federal Republic of Germany, and the remaining two were in Canada and the United States of America. Eleven of the aircraft were involved in low-flying operations when the accident occurred. In respect of the cost of the aircraft involved, it is now our practice not to publish unit production costs, but I refer the hon. Member to table 3·2 of volume 2 of the "Statement on Defence Estimates 1988" (Cm. 344-11).

Flying Accidents

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the accident on 10 May involving a Tornado GR1 which crashed near Ankum, in northern Germany.

Mr. Freeman: On 10 May, during the course of a training exercise, a Royal Air Force Tornado GR1 of 17 Squadron, RAF Bruggen crashed some five miles north west of Ankum in the Federal Republic of Germany. Both members of the crew were killed. There were no civilian casualties, but there was minor damage to a farm building near the crash site. The RAF has convened a board of inquiry to examine fully all the circumstances of the accident, with a view to establishing its cause, and preventing recurrence. A summary of the board's findings will be published in due course and a copy placed in the Library of the House.

Army Strength (Northern Ireland)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the manpower strength of the British Army in Northern Ireland, giving details of the number of operatives for the following categories: Ulster Defence Regiment, regular British Army and British Territorial Army, on 31 December 1987.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The figures requested are as follows:

	Number
Ulster Defence Regiment	6,364
Regular Army	9,645
Territorial Army	3,744

The figures for the Ulster Defence Regiment include both full-time and part-time soldiers. Soldiers of the Territorial Army are not used in support of the RUC in counter-terrorist operations.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the average time served by officers and other ranks of the Ulster Defence Regiment separately for full-time and part-time officers as at 31 December 1987.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information on the average time in years served by UDR personnel on strength as at 31 December 1987 is as follows:

	Full-time	Part-time
Officers
Male	4·6	9·4
Female	4·5	4·1
Other ranks
Male	7·6	6·9
Female	6·9	4·6

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the numbers of operatives by rank, separately of those who have joined the Ulster Defence Regiment and its reserve, and of those who have resigned from the Ulster Defence Regiment and its reserve, in the calendar years 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the following figures are available for those male and female officers and other ranks who have joined the UDR and who have left the UDR for reasons other than medical or disciplinary or on death:

	1986		1987
	Intake	Outflow	Intake	Outflow
Officers
Male	29	29	18	30
Female	Nil	Nil	Nil	Nil
Other ranks
Male	880	694	738	701
Female	156	117	117	119

South African Armed Forces

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what training facilities are, or have been provided at the 4th Parachute Regiment's premises at Leeds road, Bradford, for members of the South African armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There is no Territorial Army centre in Leeds Road, Bradford; Headquarters Company of 4 Parachute Regiment has its premises in Thornbury barracks, Pudsey. No training facilities have been extended to South African armed forces within these premises, nor are there any plans to do so.

P and O

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) Official Report, 20 May, column 611, how many P and O company personnel have been allowed use of Ministry of Defence facilities; if he will list the facilities so used; over what period of time they have been used; what has been the charge to the company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The P and O company has hired the swimming pool belonging to the Royal Marines school of music thrice-weekly since 9 May. On each occasion about 20 P and O employees have used the pool and changing facilities. The company has been charged at the normal rate of £7·75 per 45-minute session for use of the pool. The hire of the pool to P and O is consistent with long-standing arrangements which I referred to in my reply to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on the 20 May at column 611.

Major Cory

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement on his Department's handling of the case of Major Cory, in the light of the inaccuracies now acknowledged by his Department in the statement made by Mr. James Ramsden in the House on 17 December 1963, with particular reference to the judgment of the court martial appeals court.

Mr. Freeman: Mr. Ramsden made certain omissions in his statement to the House in his account of the internal investigation in 1963 into the trial of Major Cory but these were made in the interests of brevity. Major Cory has also drawn attention to the fact that certain references in the statement were at variance with certain statements in the judgment of the courts-martial appeals court. I wish to make it quite clear that if any statements were made to the House which were open to misinterpretation, or if any facts were omitted, thereby allowing an interpretation to Major Cory's discredit, there was no intention to mislead and the statement made should not be taken to contradict or minimise Major Cory's complete exoneration by the courts-martial appeal court's judgment. Major Cory is innocent of all the charges and an ex gratia payment was made to him in 1963 in respect of this miscarriage of justice. I regret that due to an administrative error by the MOD Major Cory's name was not removed from the records held at the national identification bureau. I can assure my hon. Friend that this has now been rectified.

"Tumbledown"

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice and assistance was sought of his Department during the production of the British Broadcasting Corporation film "Tumbledown"; what assessment was made of the extent to which the proposed portrayal of the treatment of Lieutenant Robert Lawrence following his wounding during the Falklands war was (a) accurate and (b) in conformity with standard military procedure; what representations he has received on this matter; what action has been taken as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: At an early stage, the BBC sought assistance in making the drama "Tumbledown" and gave the MOD a copy of the playwright's script and asked for facilities including permission to film within MOD establishments and for equipment, aircraft and helicopters to be made available. The BBC was told, however, that the MOD was unhappy about the script mixing fact with fiction and that it could cause offence to individuals who would consider themselves portrayed and who had no means of defending themselves or their reputations. Since the BBC were adamant the script was a work of drama and were unwilling to consider any rewriting, the MOD declined to offer any assistance with "Tumbledown" and, consequently, made no detailed analysis of how accurately the script reflected events or military procedures. There has been no further contact with the BBC on the subject. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received two letters from private individuals expressing concern that "Tumbledown" might misrepresent actual events.

Military Land (Rally Sports)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much gross income was derived in each of the last five years by the use of military controlled land and facilities by all forms of rally sport.

Mr. Freeman: I regret the information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Glasgow Airport

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many military operations and excercises, by month and for each year since 1974 have in any way used Glasgow airport.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

"British Defence Policy 1988-89"

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total cost of preparing and printing "British Defence Policy 1988-89"; how many copies have been printed; whether there will be a charge made for copies; and what is the expected readership.

Mr. Freeman: The estimated costs of producing "British Defence Policy 1988-89" were approximately £69,000; 80,000 copies of the booklet have been printed initially, for issues free of charge to Members of Parliament, peers, journalists, foreign defence attaches and advisers, diplomatic posts abroad, officials and members of the armed forces, recruits to the services and members of the public who request it.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Social Fund

15. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the first full month's operation of the social fund in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Information about social fund applications is collected on the basis of calendar months, and I will place details in the Library on a similar basis to that announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services on 6 May.

Unemployment Levels

16. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to monitor changes in relative unemployment levels among Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland over the next five years; and what goals and timetables he intends to set for reduction of existing inequalities.

27. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Government will set goals and timetables for the eradication of present inequalities in levels of unemployment among Catholics and Protestants in Northern Ireland; and what steps are proposed to monitor changes in relative levels.

Mr. Viggers: The Government's plans for evaluating the impact of our fair employment policies are set out in the White Paper on fair employment which was published yesterday. It would be inappropriate to set targets for unemployment levels.

Michael Tighe

18. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received about the validity of the legal authority under which a bug was placed in the hay shed where Michael Tighe was killed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I have answered three parliamentary questions on this subject from the hon. Member.

West Belfast (Job Creation)

19. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to announce further proposals for job creation in west Belfast; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland told the House on 28 April, the Government are considering what additional steps, in which the private sector must have a major role, could be taken to strengthen economic activity in west Belfast. However, the biggest single boost to job creation would come from a renunciation of violence.

Jobcentres

20. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what contribution is being made by jobcentres in Northern Ireland to the provision of opportunities for equal and fair employment.

Mr. Viggers: Job markets provide employment services to all persons regardless of sex, or religion. The "Guide to Effective Practice" issued by the Department of Economic Development last year encouraged employers to use job markets to fill job vacancies. Special help is given to disabled persons through the Department's disablement resettlement officer service.

Explosives and Arms Caches

21. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the number of explosive and arms caches discovered since 1 January.

Mr. Tom King: The determined efforts of the security forces throughout the island of Ireland have led to the recovery of a substantial amount of arms, ammunition and explosives. Since 1 January this year there have been over 100 caches of various sizes discovered in Northern Ireland. The most significant of these were the discovery of 91 assorted weapons, 150 hand grenades and 11,500 rounds of ammunition at Portadown on 8 January; 27 weapons, 20 hand grenades, two rocket launchers and 11,000 rounds of ammunition at Lisburn on 3 February; and 53 weapons, 126 hand grenades, one rocket launcher and 40,500 rounds of ammunition in north Belfast the following day.

Overall, a total of 296 weapons, just over 70,000 rounds of ammunition and approximately 4,100 lb of explosives have been recovered in Northern Ireland. Some 200 weapons, about 139,000 rounds of ammunition and 600 lb of commercial explosives have also been recovered by the Garda Siochana.

Security

22. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he remains satisfied with the implementation of security in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

40. Sir John Biggs-Davison: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the security of the Province.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux).

42. Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on security in Northern Ireland, with special reference to Mid-Ulster.

Mr. Tom King: Since the beginning of this year, two people have been killed in Mid-Ulster as a result of terrorist activity. Both were members of the security forces; Private Gibson a part-time member of UDR and Gunner Morgan from 19th Field Regiment, Royal Artillery, who were murdered by the Provisional IRA in separate incidents on 26 April.

School Meals

23. Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has on the number of children taking school meals; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: At the annual census on a day in October 1987, 165,387 pupils were taking school meals.

Benefits

24. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland who were in receipt of social security benefit at 31 March are now (a) no longer in receipt of benefit and (b) in receipt of benefit at a reduced rate; and what is the range, in money terms, of such loss of benefit suffered by the above categories.

Mr. Needham: The information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

25. Mr. McCusker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the achievements of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: The agreement has offered reassurance to members of both traditions that their rights and identities will be respected; it has opened the way to intensified cross-border co-operation on a wide range of matters, and in particular in the security field offers the opportunity for fundamentally improved links between the security forces; and it has permitted Anglo-Irish relations to be conducted on a closer and more informal basis and provides a more immediate forum for the discussion of problems that arise either between north and south or between the two traditions.

Intergovernmental Conference

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what reforms in the administration of justice were discussed at the recent meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Member to the statement issued after the last meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 4 May. The Government attach great importance to ensuring that where there are genuine concerns about justice issues, everything possible is done to tackle those issues so as further to enhance the confidence of the whole community in Northern Ireland in the administration of justice.

Schoolchildren (Integration)

28. Mr. Favell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on progress towards the greater integration of schoolchildren of different denominations.

34. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on the progress towards integrated schools in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government are encouraged by the growing evidence of the willingness of parents to have their children educated in the integrated schools. The Government's proposals to facilitate the creation of grant-maintained integrated schools will offer a further opportunity for the expression of parental wishes.

Benefit System

29. Ms. Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has with pensioners' organisations concerning the changes in the social security benefit system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: None.

Political Parties (Consultations)

30. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last consulted the leaders of the Northern Ireland political parties represented at Westminster.

Mr. Tom King: I regularly consult the leaders of the constitutional political parties in Northern Ireland on legislative and other proposals. I last discussed prospects for political progress with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and party colleagues on 26 April, and with the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) on 11 May. I expect to meet the Unionist leaders again today.

Intergovernmental Conference

31. Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on matters discussed at the last meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference.

Mr. Tom King: I refer the hon. Gentleman to a reply I gave earlier to a question from the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan).

Health and Social Services

32. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about his plans for health and social services in the Province for the next year; and whether he has yet met the chairman of the four area boards.

Mr. Needham: My long-term strategy for the health and personal social services remains as set out in the regional strategy which I published in August 1987.

I met the chairman of the Western health and social services board on 16 May in the course of the 1988 accountability reviews and I have made arrangements to meet the other chairmen soon. One of my aims will be to consider and agree with them on detailed plans for 1988-89.

Harland and Wolff

33. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met representatives of Harland and Wolff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Mr. Callaghan).

Rating Reform

35. Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had regarding the possible introduction of a community charge to replace the existing Northern Ireland rating system.

Dr. Mawhinney: I have had no discussions on this matter.

Irish Republican Army

36. Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will seek to procure from right hon. and hon. Members representing Northern Ireland who attend this House, and from Protestant and Catholic leaders, a common declaration against the Irish Republican Army.

Mr. Tom King: I trust that all right hon. and hon. Members who represent the constitutional political parties in Northern Ireland, as well as the leaders of the Churches in the Province, will continue to make clear their condemnation and detestation, which the Government fully share, of all acts of terrorism in Northern Ireland.

Fair Employment (Code)

37. Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will take steps to ensure that the principles upon which the new code of conduct on fair employment will be based will be included in the proposed legislation in this area.

Mr. Viggers: The White Paper on fair employment indicates that the future code of practice will be a comprehensive guide to the ways in which employers can discharge their responsibilities under the proposed legislation. As such, the code will reflect the principles of that legislation.

Gibraltar Shootings (BBC Programme)

38. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the British Broadcasting Corporation prior to the broadcast of the Spotlight programme on the Gibraltar shootings.

Mr. Tom King: None.

Police (Discussions)

39. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Commissioner of the Garda Siochana; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Tom King: I last met the Chief Constable and the Garda Commissioner at the meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 4 May. As the statement which was issued after the meeting made clear, we discussed a number of matters relating to security co-operation including joint action against racketeering and smuggling.

RUC (Recruitment)

41. Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the implications for security in Northern Ireland of recruitment to the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. Tom King: The Royal Ulster Constabulary has no difficulty in attracting the necessary number of high calibre recruits required to maintain the level of manpower in the force at its full establishment. Last year 4,872 applications were received for the regular force, a substantial increase on previous years, with 246 officers appointed including 17 graduates. 3,909 applications were received for the full-time reserve with 403 appointed. The increased establishment of 250 officers, announced on 6 May 1987, was reached by 31 January 1988.

Republic of Ireland (Ministers)

7. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he will next have meetings with Ministers of the Republic of Ireland; and what subjects he will discuss.

Mr. Tom King: I hope to meet Irish Ministers shortly, at a meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference. The final agenda is not yet fixed but security co-operation will certainly be one of the subjects and as announced after the last meeting, the problems of west Belfast and other disadvantaged areas will be discussed together with a number of other matters.

The joint statement issued after the last meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference on 4 May sets out the matters discussed. A copy has been placed in the Library.

West Belfast (Job Creation)

14. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to announce further proposals for job creation in west Belfast and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Northern Ireland told the House on 28 April the Government are considering what additional steps, in which the private sector must have a major role, could be taken to strengthen economic activity in west Belfast. However, the biggest single boost to job creation would come from a renunciation of violence.

Terrorism Cases (Appeals)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cases concerning scheduled offences were referred to the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in 1986 and 1987; and in how many of these referred cases the original conviction was (a) quashed and (b) upheld.

Mr. Stanley: Outcome of appeals disposed of in the Court of Appeal (Criminal Appeals) following conviction for scheduled offences.

	1986	1987
Appeal abandoned	30	26
Appeal dismissed	58	92
Conviction quashed	70	2
Sentence varied	5	25
Total number disposed of	163	145

Irish Language

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times the role of Irish in the curriculum was discussed at the curriculum conferences of the inspectorate of education since 1968; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The role of individual subjects is not normally discussed at the full conference of the Inspectorate. However, in recent years the inspectorate's panel for languages other than English has discussed various aspects relating to the teaching of Irish including the initial and in-service training of teachers of Irish, the development of resource materials for teachers and pupils in Irish language classes, the assessment of Irish through the graded objectives approach and the introduction of GCSE Irish.

West Belfast

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met community groups in west Belfast to discuss the economic and social problems of the area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ilsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met community groups in west Belfast to discuss its economic and social problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: Ministers and officials frequently meet Community and other groups to discuss how to improve economic, social and physical conditions. I believe that further measures taken must include a role for the voluntary and private sectors.

Crime Statistics

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were convicted in 1987, either on their own admission of guilt or following a plea of not guilty, on the basis of evidence on behalf of the Crown given by alleged accomplices in cases concerning scheduled offences in Northern Ireland; how many suspects arrested on the basis of such evidence have been released as a result of the retraction of evidence given by accomplices; how many people are presently awaiting trial as a result of evidence obtained from alleged accomplices; and how many people have been found not guilty, or not guilty on appeal, on the basis of such evidence.

Mr. Stanley: In 1987, none.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were remanded in custody before trial for scheduled and non-scheduled offences and both together in the second half of 1987.

Mr. Stanley: A total of 939 persons were remanded in custody in the scond half of 1987, 542 of whom were charged with scheduled offences and 397 with non-scheduled offences.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of prisoners on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively, were (a) given a non-custodial sentence, (b) given a custodial sentence and (c) found not guilty or not proceeded against in 1987.

Mr. Stanley: Following is the information:

Disposal	Scheduled offences per cent.	Non-scheduled offences per cent.
Non-custodial sentence	12·9	17·4
Custodial sentence	74·6	64·2
Found not guilty or not proceeded against	12·5	18·4

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average number of days that prisoners spent on custodial remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences and both together in 1987.

Mr. Stanley: For persons who were tried in 1987 and who were in custody at the time of their trial, the average time spent on custodial remand was 178 days for persons charged with scheduled offences and 46 days for persons charged with non-scheduled offences.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for bail by those held on remand for scheduled and non-scheduled offences and both together were refused bail in 1987.

Mr. Stanley: A total of 576 bail applications were refused in 1987 in respect of persons charged with scheduled offences and 228 in respect of persons charged with non-scheduled offences. The latter includes a corrected figure of 111 refusals in the first six months of the year rather than 110 as stated in my reply to the hon. Member on 18 December 1987, at column 800.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average number of days spent on remand for both scheduled and non-scheduled offences together, in the second half of 1987; what was the total number of persons remanded in custody before trial for both scheduled and non-scheduled offences together in the second half of 1987; and what was the number of bail applications refused for (a) scheduled offences, (b) non-sheduled offences and (c) both together in the second half of 1987.

Mr. Stanley: In the second half of 1987, 939 persons were remanded in custody, 341 bail applications were refused in respect of persons charged with scheduled offences and 117 in respect of persons charged with non-scheduled offences. The average length of time spent on custodial remand for persons tried in the second half of 1987 and who were in custody at the date of the trial was 108 days.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were detained under the Emergency Provisions (Northern Ireland) Acts 1973 and 1978 in the first six months of 1987 and in the second half of 1987; and how many of these persons were subsequently charged with (a) scheduled offences and (b) non-scheduled offences.

Mr. Stanley: In the first half of 1987, 48 persons were arrested under section 14 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, and 378 under section 11. The power of arrest under section 11 was repealed from 15 June 1987. Nobody was arrested under section 13. Fourty-four of those arrested were subsequently charged with scheduled offences and two with non-scheduled offences.

In the second half of 1987, nine persons were arrested under section 13 of the Act and 47 under Section 14. I shall write to the hon. Member with the numbers subsequently charged.

Prisoners (Statistics)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average period of custodial remand for female custodial remand prisoners in Northern Ireland for the years 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows.

The average length of time spent on custodial remand by female prisoners who were in custody at the time of their trial was 129 days for those tried in 1986, and 43 days for those tried in 1987.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners were remanded in custody prior to trial for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively, in 1987.

Mr. Stanley: A total of 1,813 persons were remanded in custody in 1987, 1,043 of whom were charged with scheduled offences and 770 with non-scheduled offences.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the number of prisoners in Northern Ireland's prisons as at 31 December 1987, detailing the numbers by sex, in prison and in young offenders centres separately.

Mr. Stanley: On 31 December 1987 there were 1,871 inmates in Northern Ireland prison establishments of whom 1,844 were males and 27 were females; 1,673 were in prisons and 198 in young offenders centres.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the size of the present prison population in Northern Ireland, divided into terrorist type offenders and other offenders, categorised by age and by sex in the following groups (a) under 18 years of age, (b) 18 to 25 years, (c) 25 to 30 years, (d) 30 to 40 years, (e) 40 to 50 years, (f) 50 to 60 years and (g) over 60 years; and if he will give a breakdown of the length of sentence being served by each age group under the following headings: (i) up to three months, (ii) over three months and up to six months, (iii) over six months and under 12 months, (iv) over 12 months and under 18 months, (v) over 18 months and up to four years, (vi) over four years and up to eight years, (vii) over eight years and (viii) life, together with a breakdown, divided into terrorist-type offenders and other offenders under the same sentence headings, of the numbers as a percentage of the total prison population.

Mr. Stanley: On 1 April 1988 (the latest date for which figures in such detail are available) there were 1,753 sentenced inmates in Northern Ireland prison establishments. This includes those detained in the young offenders centres. The requested breakdowns of the population are set out in the tables below.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners charged with scheduled offences in the latest calendar year were remanded in custody prior to trial for periods between (a) nil to three months, (b) three to six months, (c) six to nine months, (d) nine to 12 months, (e) 12 to 18 months and (f) over 18 months, for scheduled and non-scheduled offences, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: The length of time spent on custodial remand for persons tried during 1987 and who were in custody at the time of their trial and charged with scheduled and non-scheduled offences respectively was as follows:

Time in Custody	Scheduled offences	Non-scheduled offences
Less than three months	249	397
Three months up to six months	71	47
Six months up to nine months	64	20
Nine months up to 12 months	47	4
12 months up to 18 months	53	5
Over 18 months	20	4
Total	504	477

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average length of custodial sentence of female prisoners in Northern Ireland in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows: The average determinate sentence imposed on female prisoners in 1986 was 12.8 months, and in 1987 10 months. Four women prisoners were sentenced to life imprisonment in 1986, none in 1987.

Plastic Bullets

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many formal complaints have been made about incidents of police use of plastic baton rounds in 1987; in how many cases the complaint has been upheld; and in how many cases disciplinary action has been taken against the officers involved.

Mr. Stanley: During 1987, seven formal complaints were made concerning the use of plastic baton rounds by the Royal Ulster Constabulary. Two were later withdrawn. Police reports on four others were sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions who directed no prosecution on each. The question of disciplinary action is now being considered by the deputy Chief Constable, and in due course the papers will be referred to the Independent Commission for Police Complaints. The remaining complaint is still under investigation.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many plastic bullets were fired in Northern Ireland in 1987 and in what circumstances: in what location the bullets were fired; and how many persons were injured as a result of the use of plastic bullets.

Mr. Stanley: During 1987, 2,575 plastic baton rounds were fired in Northern Ireland; 40 people were allegedly injured in the period. I am writing to the hon. Member with the information he has requested about the circumstances and places in which the baton rounds were fired. A copy of my letter will be placed in the Library.

Security (Fatalities)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many fatal casualties there were in 1987 arising from incidents where security forces in Northern Ireland opened fire on vehicles taken without their owners' consent.

Mr. Stanley: There was one such incident in 1987. On 8 May, eight terrorists attacked the RUC station at Loughgall using vehicles which had been hijacked earlier. All the terrorists were killed. An innocent passer-by was also killed during this attack.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give details of the manpower strength of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and its Reserve, as between full-time, part-time, male and female, operatives as at 31 December 1987.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows:

Strength of RUC and RUC reserve as at 31 December 1987

	Male	Female	Total
RUC	7,591	645	8,236
RUC reserve (full-time)	2,983	4	2,987
RUC reserve (part-time)	1,336	321	1,657

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will detail how many attacks on Royal Ulster Constabulary personnel took place in 1987, showing whether the attack was on (a) a foot patrol and (b) a mobile patrol and the total attacked while on duty each month together with details of the type of attack, namely (i) physical assault, (ii) stone throwing, (iii) petrol bomb, (iv) explosion and (v) shooting, and the number of persons made amenable.

Mr. Stanley: Information is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, in 1987 there were over 950 incidents in which the police were attacked either on or off duty. Of these, 105 incidents involved the use of explosives and 92 the use of firearms.

Firearms

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will detail the number of arms found in 1987 under the headings of (a) machine guns, (b) rifles, (c) shotguns, (d) pistols/revolvers and (e) others.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows:

	Number
Machine Guns	23
Rifles	223
Shotguns	76
Pistols/Revolvers	152
Others	108

Note:

"Others" include—Antique weapons, anti-tank weapons, blank firing pistols, replica pistols, replical revolvers, replica sub-machine guns, starting pistols and starting revolvers.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will show in a table how many legally held firearms were stolen in Northern Ireland during 1987 from (i) Royal Ulster Constabulary/Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve and Special Constabulary, (ii) Ulster Defence Regiment, (iii) British Army and (iv) civilians; and if he will give a breakdown of weapons stolen as in (i) bullet firing, (ii) shotguns and (iii) air weapons and miscellaneous, to include blank firing weapons, muzzle loading weapons and antique weapons.

Mr. Stanley: The information is as follows:

	Bullet Firing	Shotgun	Air weapons/ miscellaneous[2]
Royal Ulster Constabulary and Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve[1]	10	—	—
Ulster Defence Regiment	178	—	4
Regular Army	—	—	—
Civilians	35	91	14

[1] Ulster Special Constabulary were disbanded in 1970.
[2] Also included in this category are air rifles, humane killers and flare pistols.

Security Forces (Offences)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the security forces convicted of offences in Northern Ireland and sentenced to custodial sentences have been allowed to return to Great Britain to serve their sentences for humanitarian reasons in 1987; and how many members of the security forces secured early release from their sentences in 1987.

Mr. Stanley: There were no transfers of sentenced members of the security forces to Great Britain during 1987, and in that year no such person was released in Northern Ireland except under normal release procedures.

Fair Employment

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the proposed legislation on equality of opportunity in employment in Northern Ireland will include the principles upon which a revised code of conduct on fair employment will be based.

Mr. Viggers: The White Paper on fair employment indicates that the future code of practice will be a comprehensive guide to the ways in which employers can discharge their responsibilities under the proposed legislation. As such the code will reflect the principles of that legislation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Cash Limits

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of any revised cash limits for his Department's Votes.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to parliamentary approval to the necessary supplementary estimate, cash limits for the following Votes will be revised as follows:

Vote	Current cash limit £	Increase-decrease £	Revised cash limit £
Class XII Vote 1	463,655,000	16,366,000	480,021,000
Class XII Vote 3	1,843,563,000(1)	−53,000	1,843,510,000

Of these changes, £1,900,000 will be charged to the reserve and £14,436,000 is contained within the planned provision for programmes. There will therefore be no increase in the planned total of expenditure.

Additional provision is sought for Class XIII, Vote 1 as follows:

Fifty three thousand pounds to enable the Cranfield institute of technology to participate in the programme for manufacturing systems engineering courses. This increase to be offset by a matching reduction in provision on Class XIII, Vote 3.

Eleven million, four hundred and thirteen thousand pounds for costs associated with the establishment, subject to the passage of the Education Reform Bill, of the National Curriculum Council; the School Examination and Assessment Council; the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council and the Education Assets Board.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those of his Department's forms, leaflets and pamphlets in relation to university education in Wales which were issued in bilingual or Welsh language format.

Mr. Jackson: Most publications concerning university education in Wales are issued by other agencies: the Department does not use the Welsh language in its publications.

Lecturers

Mr. Summerson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he will take to reorganise the pay structure of lecturers in further education so that they receive promotion through merit rather than by effluxion of time.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has only observer status on the National Joint Council (Further Education). The grade of a lecturer is currently determined largely by the level of teaching in which he or she is engaged, and whether he or she has management responsibilities. The basic lecturer grade will from July have a salary maximum of £15,369—£1,506 more than a school teacher on the main professional grade who does not hold an incentive allowance. Progression to the next grade is automatic only for lecturers engaged for 50 per cent. of their time essentially on courses above A-level standard, and it is possible for progression to be refused on the grounds that a lecturer is inefficient. Progression to the remaining grades is on merit. Further education lecturers are thus not generally guaranteed promotion within the existing pay structure on the basis of length of service alone. The Government will be looking to the further education sector in the years ahead to refine this salary structure so as to provide further incentives for good cost-effective teaching.

A-levels (Bolton)

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many pupils in Bolton's secondary schools took A-level examinations during 1986 and 1987; and how many are scheduled to sit the examination in the current year.

Mrs. Rumbold: In 1985-86, 710 school leavers from maintained schools in Bolton attempted A-levels and 670 achieved one or more A-level passes. Information for 1987 and 1988 is unavailable.

Pupils (Equal Opportunities)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give guidance to local education authorities about the implications of the recent decision in the courts with respect to equal opportunities between male and female pupils.

Mr. Dunn: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the recent decision by the Court of Appeal to uphold the earlier High Court ruling that Birmingham city council was guilty of unlawful sex discrimination in providing fewer selective places for girls than for boys in the city's maintained grammar schools. I understand that the council now intends to appeal against the judgment to the House of Lords. My right hon. Friend wishes to await the outcome of that appeal before considering whether it would be appropriate to offer any guidance to local education authorities.

Dementia

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current level of funding by his Department for research into problems associated with dementia in the elderly.

Mr. Jackson: The Medical Research Council, which receives a grant in aid from this Department, is the main agency through which Government fund medical research in the United Kingdom. In 1986-87, the last financial year for which figures are available, the council spent £435,000 on projects directly related to dementias and a further £2·4 million on research that could increase our understanding of dementias. Some support for research on dementia is also provided through UGC block grants to universities and medical schools.

Aging

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many research students are funded by the Medical Research Council; and what proportion of the total are engaged in research into aging.

Mr. Jackson: I understand that the Medical Research Council is currently supporting 605 research students. The council does not hold any information on the proportion of these students engaged on research into aging.

TRANSPORT

Planning Inquiries (Reports)

Mr. Tom Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will take steps to introduce in England and Wales a facility for the proposal of corrections of facts in drafts of inspectors' reports at planning inquiries, similar to that which already exists in Scotland.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have no plans to make such a change.

Air Routes

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if, when he next meets the chairman of the Civil Aviation Authority, he will discuss the criteria to be used at the route licence hearings involving the former British Caledonian routes from Gatwick to Nice, Oslo, Edinburgh, Glasgow and Manchester.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In view of his appellate role, it would be improper for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to discuss individual cases with the chairman. The authority will consider these applications on the evidence and arguments presented, in the light of its duties and its current statement of air transport licensing policies.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications of the decision by the Civil Aviation Authority not to award the Gatwick-Brussels route formerly operated by British Caledonian Airways to British Airways for Her Majesty's Government's policy on competition and consumer choice in aviation.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not comment on the implications of specific licensing decisions which may be subject to appeal to him.

Road Schemes (Kent)

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretay of State for Transport if he will list his Department's proposed road improvement or new road schemes costing £100,000 or more which are planned to start in Kent within the next five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: "Policy for Roads in England: 1987" (Cm125) lists the following national trunk road programme schemes in Kent:

(a) Planned start of construction to March 1989.

M20 Maidstone-Ashford.
A282 Dartford-Thurrock Crossing and Approach Roads.

(b) Planned start of construction April 1989 to March 1991

A20 Folkestone-Dover Stage 1 (Folkestone-Court Wood)
A249 A2 Junction-M2 Junction Dualling
A249 Iwade Bypass

(c) Planned start of construction from April 1991 onwards

M2 Widening between Junctions 1-3
M20 Widening between Junctions 5-8 (Maidstone Bypass)
A20 Folkestone-Dover Stage 2 (Court Wood-Dover)
A21 Kipping's Cross-Lamberhurst Improvement
A21 Lamberhurst Bypass
A21 Tonbridge Bypass-Pembury Bypass Improvement
A259 New Romney Bypass
A259 St. Mary's Bay and Dymchurch Bypass
A261 M20-A259 Hythe Improvement

In addition work to provide hard shoulders on the A2 from the London boundary to the M2, phased over the period 1985-1991, is continuing. Construction of the Maidstone-Ashford section of the M20 should start later this year. The start dates for the remaining schemes are dependent upon the completion of the statutory procedures.

The Department is also considering the following trunk road schemes in Kent, costing £100,000 or more, within its south-east regional programme:—

M20 Traffic lights at the Junction 7 exit.
M25 Crossovers between Junction 5 and the Surrey boundary.
A2 Lighting to the west of the Medway towns.
A2 Central reserve safety fencing between the M2 and Harbledon; and between Harbledon and Bridge.
A21 Central reserve safety fencing between the A225 and A2014.
A249 Brielle Way Improvement.
A259 Improvement to the Junction with the A2070 at Brenzett.
A259 Taylors Lane—Coast Drive Improvement.
A259 Tartane Lane—Tudor Avenue Improvement.
A259 Park Farm/Pavilion Road Junction Improvements.
A259 Shorncliffe Road, Castle Road and Cheriton Avenue Junction Improvements.

Passenger Ferries

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stretford on 23 May, if he plans to alter his definition of and acceptable evacuation time for a passenger ferry; if the research programme to which he refers is concerned with evacuation time; and when he expects it to report.
